Very respectfully, yours, WILLIAM F. MURRAY.

LABOR.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech by my colleague, the Hon. H. ROBERT FOWLER, made at Bicknell, Ind., on the 7th day of September, 1914, Labor Day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting in the RECORD a speech made by the Hon. H. ROBERT FOWLER at Bicknell, Ind., on Labor Day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up and consider the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor bill, together with the Senate amendment thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to take up for consideration the river and harbor bill with the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. CALLAWAY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to know how long it will take.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am under the impression that it will take all the afternoon if we get unanimous consent. My purpose is to give time for discussion, and I am informed that there are enough gentlemen asking for time to run throughout most of the afternoon.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I would not object if I knew that we could get through with the river and harbor bill to-day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Texas that of course the river and harbor bill will be in order when the bill now under consideration is out of the way, because it will be privileged. But the bill as reported from the committee favors the Senate amendment, and only provides for the completion of the work now in progress. A number of contractors have had to stop work on account of the delay. Every day that the passage of the bill is delayed it is costing the Government money. If we are going to continue the work, the sooner they are furnished with the money the less it will cost the Government. I should like very much, if we can do so, to get the opportunity for the gentleman from Florida to present the bill to the House. Of course he has to give gentlemen opposed to it a reasonable opportunity to be heard, but I think it is possible to get through with it this afternoon if we take it up now. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether there will be any opposition on that side that will probably run longer than this afternoon?

Mr. MANN. I should think that if the bill were taken up now, we might finish it this afternoon. But the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] knows more about the time than I do.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think we could get through this afternoon. I think we want about two hours.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman means on that side?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Did the gentleman say two hours?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Two hours and a half, for I shall yield to two gentlemen on the other side; we will not divide on party lines.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of course, we should want as much time on this side, although I think we could close up in two hours.

Mr. MANN. I think we could get through this afternoon.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida a question.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will yield.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not a fact that if we do not accept the bill as it passed the Senate we will get no river and harbor legislation at this session?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is decidedly my opinion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it not a fact that confronting that situation there is no doubt about the consent of the House being given to the legislation?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I hope there is no doubt. As I see the situation, I think there is little doubt but that the House will accept the Senate amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is no doubt but that the House will accept what the newspapers describe as "pork" in the $20,000,000 if they can not get $53,000,000. I do not see why there should be a whole legislative day consumed in the discussion of what is already foreordained. I wish we could agree on a shorter time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will say that this thing has been going on six months. Six months ago the bill went to the Senate, and the discussion began two months afterwards when it was reported out of the committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Can not we agree on a shorter time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not see how we can.

Mr. MANN. This is a more important matter than the Botanic Garden, and we spent two days on that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think we ought to discuss this matter at some length, but, of course, not at too great a length.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Florida will yield to me a moment, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington what proposals they have by way of amendment, after the general debate has been concluded?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, there will be one amendment submitted. There will be an amendment submitted to reduce the amount considerably from what it is now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Could an agreement be made that after five hours of general debate any amendments may be offered during the debate and that at the end of five hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the Senate amendment and all amendments thereto and the House go to voting?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I think it would be perfectly fair to consider the Senate amendment in the House, instead of going into the Committee of the Whole, with the right to offer amendments during the five hours, and then that the previous question should be considered as ordered on the amendments and the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think that would be satisfactory, because the only amendment I anticipate will be an amendment to reduce the amount.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman desire to have the amendments voted on when they are offered in the House or at the end of the general debate?

Mr. MANN. I think we better vote at the end, because otherwise it would be sure to run over.

Mr. BORLAND. Would not the bill be considered in the Committee of the Whole in any event?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The proposition is that it shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I take it that there will be no desire to prolong matters.

Mr. BORLAND. The amendments would be disposed of in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, there is no desire to use any delaying tactics.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if we considered it in the House, and there were a great many amendments offered, it might delay, but we want a roll call at least upon one amendment, or upon a motion to recommit, it does not make any difference which, for it would be in order in either case, but we want only one roll call.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I suggest to the gentleman from Florida that he ask unanimous consent for its consideration along that line.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 13811, the river and harbor appropriation bill, with a Senate amendment thereto, and pending that I also suggest that we have five hours of general discussion.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he make that a part of his request.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well; and that we have five hours of general discussion, or at least that the discussion end by 5 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Make the request in this way: That the bill be taken up for consideration, together with the Senate amendment, that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, with five hours of debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] and one-half by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], and that any gentleman having the floor shall be entitled to offer an amendment to be voted upon at the end of the general debate, and that at that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill, including the Senate amendment thereto; that the debate thereon shall not exceed five hours; that it shall be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole; that any gentleman getting the floor shall have the right to offer an amendment; and that at the end of the general debate, if it stops short of five hours, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the Senate amendment, and all amendments thereto, and that all of these amendments offered by Members pending the debate shall be voted on at the conclusion of the debate, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Florida and the other half by the gentleman from Washington. Is there objection?

Mr. CALLAWAY. If that could be amended so as to make it four hours, I shall not object; but I do not believe that we can get through with five hours of debate in this day.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Texas yields, I would suggest that if we make it four hours of general debate, we would not be able to go ahead with anything else to-day.

Mr. CALLAWAY. I know; but I want this thing to be gotten off the boards to-day.

Mr. MANN. We can get it off the boards, I think, without any trouble to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Speaker, if that request is so modified as to make it extend no longer than this legislative day, I shall withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that it is possible to extend the legislative day until the 4th of March.

Mr. CALLAWAY. Then, that it does not extend any longer than this calendar day.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. And also to be coupled with the request the provision that the discussion and disposition of the matter shall not extend beyond this calendar day. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule which was adopted with reference to the Philippine bill, and which seems to have cut out everything else, is Calendar Wednesday cut out?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not. The Chair would have ruled, if the point of order had been made, that it took a two-thirds vote of the House to pass that rule, provided it cut out Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, may I submit another inquiry, if it is in order? I noticed a while ago that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] had quite an audience in private conversation, and while I do not wish to intrude, I would like to inquire whether he has any statement which might be made to both sides of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that if I can reach an understanding with this side of the House about one particular bill, I will be glad to submit a proposition to him and his side of the House to make a pact that will let Members go home. I hope to be in a position to do so by to-morrow, and that is as close as I can get. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of tariff and labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of tariff and labor. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] is recognized for two and one-half hours.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, so as to have it pending——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the bill be laid before the House and the Senate amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. That is correct; and the Clerk will report the bill by title and report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 13811) entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the sum of $20,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation, and most economical and advantageous in the execution of the work: Provided, That allotments from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: Provided further, That allotments for the Mississippi River from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the next session of Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amount allotted under this appropriation to each work of improvement."

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, so as to have the same pending, I move that the Senate amendment be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] moves that the Senate amendment be agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not make this motion because I like the provision which the Senate has given us as a substitute for the bill we sent them months ago. On the contrary, I do not hesitate to say I am not at all pleased with it. I make the motion to concur because I am instructed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to do so. I also make it because I am convinced it is the only thing to do if we are to have money to prosecute the work on the many great projects for river and harbor improvement now under way or to maintain in their efficiency those already completed.

If I were actuated by the rule-or-ruin spirit, if I were to say as others have said—if not in words, in acts—adopt my views or our navigable waterways will get nothing, I might perhaps take a different view; but I am convinced it is either this amendment or nothing; that we must either take what the Senate, after keeping the bill six months, has deigned to give or else cease work on the most of the projects now under way, at least until after the 4th of March next, a course of action that would result in much damage not alone to uncompleted but to completed works as well. Not only is it of great importance that a work once started should go on without material interruption to completion, but that a finished project should be maintained in its efficiency, otherwise great damage might be done both to the work and the commerce to be accommodated by it.

Already much loss has resulted from the delay in passing this bill. As early as the 11th of July last the Chief of Engineers furnished to the Rivers and Harbors Committee a statement, accompanied by a list, showing the improvements upon which work had then stopped or would cease within the two or three months following. From this statement it will be seen that work on 106 projects out of the 225 provided for in the House bill were in those classes. In the statement accompanying the list the Chief of Engineers said that:

On account of lack of funds work is now suspended, or will shortly be suspended, on about one-third of the works provided for in the pending river and harbor bill. Should no act be passed at this session, the number of works suspended will be very considerably increased before an act could be passed at the next session of Congress. The suspension of work results not only in positive loss of time and possibly interference with navigation, but seriously handicaps and greatly adds to the cost of future work by the disorganization of working forces and the effect which it has upon the confidence of contractors supplying materials or doing work for the department.

I shall print with my remarks a copy of this statement, with the accompanying list, which throws considerable light upon conditions already resulting from the delay from passing this measure and those that will result if we pass no bill at all.

Nor would I object to this provision because I think it carries a sum too small for the work contemplated by it. On the contrary, I regard the sum as sufficient for the purposes intended. Likely it could stand a slight, but only a slight, reduction, for the bill has been delayed so long in the Senate that a considerable part of the fiscal year has gone by, so that as much money is not now needed at any place as if the measure had become a law by the 30th of June last, the end of the fiscal year covered by the estimates upon which the bill of 1914 was framed, while in some localities—those in the more northerly districts, for instance, where work can not be carried on in the winter months—less will be needed. So I repeat that the amount provided in the Senate amendment is, in my opinion, ample for all the purposes it was intended to answer.

Although I think any amendment interposed by the Senate ought to have retained other features of the House bill, the dislike I have to the provision now before us is based largely on the ground that by appropriating a lump sum for the Secretary of War to distribute we abdicate for the time being our legislative functions in favor of an administrative branch of the Government. Nor is my objection to the provision based upon any lack of faith in the engineers, but because I think such legislation in a majority of instances is unwise. There is quite a tendency now in that direction, and if this should be regarded as a precedent to be followed in the future it would leave little worth having in the hands of the lawmaking body so far as legislation for the improvement of our rivers and harbors is concerned. But it need not, nor do I believe it will, be taken as a precedent or followed hereafter, as the objections to it, save under exceptional conditions, are too manifest.

I believe Congress should ordinarily apportion all sums appropriated for river and harbor work among the various projects adopted by it. With the information at hand or easily obtainable for intelligent action, we are as capable of exercising that function as the Army Engineers—and I yield to none in my admiration for that splendid corps of officers—but the responsibility is ours, and we should not ordinarily shirk it. We may make mistakes, and doubtless do, but so may the engineers, with no direct responsibility to the electorate, while for our errors we may be held answerable to the people. But this is an exceptional case, and as such we should deal with it here and now. I am willing to assume my share of the responsibility, which I do with the hope and the belief that it will not be drawn into a precedent for similar legislation in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I know some are disinclined to accept this amendment—at least, not at present—on account of a hope they have that by disagreeing to it or by agreeing with certain amendments the new projects in the House bill, some of them of great importance and all worthy, may be inserted along with the surveys, which were likewise eliminated by the Senate amendment. But anyone who has followed the debates in the Senate on the measure must see the futility of such an effort.

Those discussions and the various amendments there proposed revealed at least two groups of Senators as their respective advocates, whose differences were never composed, but seemingly grew more pronounced as the weeks and months went by. Moreover, it is the view of many there that nothing can come of any effort at amending either by reinserting the eliminated items or even apportioning here the money provided among the various projects upon which it is to be expended. In other words, it seems to be this or nothing, and, in my opinion, it is the part of wisdom to accept it. Then, again, I am satisfied, unless we permit our actions in adopting this amendment to be drawn into a precedent, no harm not already suffered by the delay will be done, as it is expected another bill will be framed at the next session, when the items omitted from this bill may be considered and adopted. The preparation of such a measure should begin in a few weeks and become a law, if at all, by the 4th of March next, so that no considerable delay is likely to be encountered. Hence I say no great harm can come from the action proposed.

Mr. Speaker, on the 26th of March last we passed through the House the annual bill for this year, which, after six months, comes back to us with all its provisions for maintenance and original construction work on more than 300 projects, together with other important provisions, including those of surveys, stricken out and a single provision appropriating a lump sum to be distributed by the engineers inserted in their stead. As it left the House, the bill was an excellent measure—not faultless, perhaps, but one framed in accordance with that policy of river and harbor improvement we have been following for nearly two decades; a policy based upon public sentiment, indorsed by all the great political parties, and demanded by the rapidly growing commerce of the country. Since and including the bill of 1896 we have enacted into law nine general river and harbor bills and two small emergency measures, the whole aggregating $483,375,023.48.

The bill of 1896, passed over President Cleveland's veto at a time when we were borrowing money, was the largest that had ever been passed up to that time, carrying as it did $76,195,570.37. Then followed the bills of 1899, 1902, and 1905, all liberal measures, which in turn were succeeded by the act of 1907, providing for 361 projects and carrying $86,872,432—the largest ever enacted into law by the Congress of the United States. I wish especially to call the attention of the critics of the bill of 1914 to this measure, and would like to have them compare it in all its details, including items and amount, with that of 1914 as it passed the House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, may I ask my colleague one question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Who was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee in 1907?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, now Senator from the State of Ohio.

The bill of 1907 has been referred to by some, and regarded, no doubt, by many, as the best ever enacted in the history of river and harbor legislation. It has been said that it was framed on scientific lines—whatever that may mean—and provided for the completion of a larger number of projects than any other. Nor am I disposed to detract from its merits. On the contrary, I wish to say that it was an excellent measure; and yet this bill, the one we are now considering, abused and traduced as it has been, was framed along the same lines as that, and was similar in form and substance, except that, being an annual bill, this did not carry, and did not need to carry, so much by way of authorizations as that of 1907.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not a fact the bill of 1907, passed at the time Mr. BURTON of Ohio was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, was a bill which contained items affecting nearly every State in the Union, and nearly every congressional district, so it was almost impossible for a vote to be obtained against that bill in the House?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Well, I would not like to say that; but I will answer the first part of the gentleman's question——

Mr. MOORE. But did not the newspapers at the time so report, and was it not common rumor over the country that the bill was so built up it was bound to pass?

Mr. SPARKMAN. There has never been a river and harbor bill—at least during the past 20 years—that has not been criticized by somebody. The bill contained items affecting every section of the country, from Maine to Puget Sound, and carried, as I said a moment ago, a larger amount than any bill before or since.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman remember the difficulty of finding anybody in the House to vote against the bill at the time? Is not that the fact?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very few did vote against it.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; it is a fact that very few did vote against the bill then.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That measure also exceeded this bill in the number of projects treated. The former, carrying appropriations for 361 improvements, provided for the completion of 99, or 27 4/10 per cent of the whole, while the latter, containing 301 items, provided for the completion of 71, or 23 6/10 per cent, or a little more than 3 per cent in favor of the bill of 1907, if that feature is to be taken as one of merit.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. FREAR. Was that an annual bill, the bill of 1907?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Oh, no; it was intended, I believe, to provide for two years, and carried a little more than twice as much as the amount carried in this measure.

Mr. FREAR. This bill provides for annual payments.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But it is about the same in substance, because that act provided for two years, carrying nearly $87,000,000, whereas this bill as it passed the House provided for one year and carried about $43,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I would like to finish; and if he will note his questions, I will be glad to yield at the end of my remarks.

Mr. FREAR. All right.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But in the matter of provisions for completing projects the present measure as it left the House was far ahead of any of the others passed during the period mentioned. There is another comparison, however, based upon the proportionate cost of the new projects adopted in each and the freight tonnage of the respective waterways involved that is somewhat in favor of the House bill of this year. The bill of 1907, for instance, adopted 63 new projects, accommodating in the aggregate 126,963,567 tons of commerce and requiring $42,728,000 to complete, while the bill of 1914 as it left the House contained 71 new projects, calling for $42,479,000 to complete and accommodating a tonnage of 146,728,920. From these figures it will be seen that not only was the aggregate cost of the new projects about the same in each bill, but that the average number of tons per project was likewise about the same, that of 1914, however, being somewhat larger.

A further analysis of the two bills shows that the cost of the projects in the bill of 1907 which may properly be designated as small projects—that is, projects requiring less than $100,000 to complete—amounted altogether to $1,172,512, but that they accommodated a commerce of only 4,494,994, while the projects in the bill of 1914, calling for less than $100,000 to complete, required $1,170,247 and accommodated a commerce of 19,258,000. In other words, while the smaller projects of the bill of 1907 were accommodating at the time the bill was passed a little less than 4 tons of freight for each dollar to be expended, the same class of projects in the bill of 1914 was, when that bill passed the House, accommodating a little more than 16 tons for each dollar required to complete. Certainly this does not show a wanton waste of money on small projects.

I will insert just here a statement of new projects in each of the two measures, giving amounts to complete, together with the tonnage and value of the freight accommodated by such waterway at the time as shown by the reports recommending the respective projects.

[1] Transfer of funds.
[2] Deed levee to State.

Again, there was a greater disproportion between the cost and tonnage of some of the items in the bill of 1907 than the cost and tonnage of similar items in the bill of 1914. For instance, in the former there was a project costing in all $1,288,699, with an appropriation and an authorization of $490,000 with only a commerce of 2,565 tons to its credit, while another, costing in all $400,000, with an initial appropriation of $120,000, only accommodated 6,000 tons of traffic.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly indicate what those projects were?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If the gentleman will pardon me, when I shall have finished I will be glad to and will try to answer any questions propounded, but would prefer not to yield just now.

No such discrepancy between freight tonnage and cost of work can be found in the bill of 1914. Of course, the amount of commerce at the time a report is submitted is not the only criterion by which to judge a project, because prospective traffic as well as other matters should be considered; but it is not amiss to call attention to such differences when the one measure is severely criticized on the theory that it is made vicious by the presence of certain features, while the other, more obnoxious in those very particulars, is lauded as a work of superior excellence.

Moreover, anyone who will stop to compare the bill of this year as it left the House with other like measures during the past 20 years will be convinced that it is not subject to the criticisms leveled against it, or, if it is, that all the others are subject to like, indeed, to harsher, criticism.

Another matter to which I wish to direct attention is that although we had a bill in 1905, that of 1907, only two years after, carried nearly $87,000,000, or twice as much as the House bill of this year, yet this measure has not only been condemned as a vicious waste of public money, but also on account of the number of smaller projects adopted, while the bill of 1907, carrying more than twice as much, is regarded as a model of perfection.

Now, I mention all this, Mr. Speaker, not only for the purpose of defending, as anyone so minded can, the bill which has been thrown aside in another body after weeks and months of the most violent criticism both there and in the press of the country, but also to illustrate the lack of knowledge of the subject discussed by those indulging in such criticisms and denunciations. Furthermore, we are to have another bill, I hope, at the next session, and it is barely possible that good may come of the analyses and comparisons I have been making.

Again, Mr. Speaker, these charges seem to be based somewhat upon the idea that the people at home want the appropriations this House was endeavoring to make. Well, that is true, for the demand comes from every part of the country where navigable waters exist or may be created at reasonable cost. But why do the people demand them unless they think they will be benefited by the desired improvement? The money asked does not go into the pockets of the people, who can neither receive nor hope to receive any benefit from an appropriation of that nature except in the way of improved navigable waterways. There can be no other reason for this demand, and the very fact that the people near a waterway demand its improvement is a strong though, of course, not a conclusive argument in favor of Government aid in making the improvement, for the people might be and sometimes are mistaken. But even then they are in a better position to judge of the merits of a proposition for such work than is one coming into the Halls of Congress from some remote section who, never having seen the waterway, is totally unacquainted with its merits and possibilities. But in any event they are honest in their demands, and it ill becomes anyone, no matter how limited his knowledge or wide his information on the subject of navigable waterway development, to condemn their representatives as thieves and grafters in making an honest and an honorable effort to carry out their wishes.

Mr. Speaker, no better illustration of the truthfulness of the adage that "a little learning is a dangerous thing" could be furnished than is afforded by the denunciation of this bill by some of its critics. Knowing little of past river and harbor legislation, and less of the policy upon which it is based, they have perhaps unwittingly been led into grievous errors and have done some harm to that important class of Government work. But unless the history of the past fails to repeat itself, their success, if indeed it can be called such, will be short lived, for the people demand the improvement of their navigable waterways and will not be denied. Of course no one wants extravagance or the adoption of projects without merit, but in my judgment the House bill of this year was neither extravagant in amount nor vicious in any of the items contained in it. Some, of course, were more meritorious than others, but none that did not come clearly within the policy we have been pursuing for the last two decades. Not one but would if completed bring beneficial results commensurate with the cost of the work, not only to the people and the commerce in the immediate vicinity, but to those of the entire country. They all form a part of our great system of navigable waterways, now the greatest and soon to become the most perfect in the world unless the work of improvement which has been going on so satisfactorily for the past two decades is halted.

Think what it would mean to have all our more than 25,000 miles of inland waterways connected by an intracoastal system so as to afford even a barge traffic over each and all of these streams in order that freight, the products of this and foreign countries, could be carried from any one point to any other place in the country reached by a navigable stream, whether called a creek or a river. Think, if you can, how much it would add to the prosperity and happiness of the people. And all this can be furnished in a few years without excessive cost if the work is prosecuted on business principles and with a view to obtaining the best results with the money expended.

Mr. Speaker, there must be something captivating in magnitude and fascinating in largely multiplied numbers, for some of these critics while passing over in silence, or giving their indorsement to, projects costing millions, though affording no immediate promise of great commercial importance, will exhaust their vocabulary of denunciation and abuse in criticism of a small project costing only a few thousand dollars, but with perhaps a hundred times as much commerce, when the money to be expended is considered. Take, for instance, the seven small projects in North Carolina so severely criticized here and elsewhere. These works would only cost to complete about $80,000, and yet in advance of the proposed improvement they now accommodate a traffic tonnage of 235,000 tons, valued at $3,000,000. This is 3 tons of commerce—one year's traffic—for each dollar to be expended, with the promise of a largely increased tonnage in the future, while some large rivers passed over without notice or with little criticism, but costing tens of millions of dollars, only show a commerce of 1 ton for each two or three dollars expended in a given year, with the improvement extending over a long period of years. Now, I do not say that these large and more expensive improvements ought not to be made, for the most of them should. But the critic who sees nothing worth noting, either to praise or censure, in the larger, but everything to condemn in the smaller, is, to say the least, not a safe watchdog of the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have no sympathy and little patience with the view expressed by some that these smaller waterways are so distinctly local that their improvement is not justified by the Federal Government. The claim is made that they are only used by a few, and that their improvement benefits a very limited number in the localities near the waterways.

Not only is the tendency to minimize the utility of the stream, but its dimensions as well. Even though it be a river of respectable proportions, it is designated by its would-be witty, if not reasonable, critics as a creek or a duck pond, dry half the year, the other half useless, and more susceptible to macadamization than of any other kind of improvement.

It is needless to say that, while this may be wit of a certain order, the claim in no instance has any foundation in fact. Not one, no matter what it is called—whether creek, slough, or river—but is a useful artery of commerce; not one but is national in its scope and, if improved, would bring results commensurate with the expenditures required for its improvement. Each one flows directly or indirectly into the ocean, where its commerce may become coastwise or foreign, or, upon being landed upon wharves reached by railroads, may be carried thence to any or all parts of the country, and often is so carried. Take the rivers in the State of Florida, for instance, whether designated in cheap witticisms as creeks or sloughs, not one but carries an important commerce, some foreign, some interstate, thus falling as completely under the commerce clause of the Constitution and becoming as distinctly national as if the stream flowed through half a dozen States and required millions to improve its bed and banks.

The changes have been rung on the word "creek," in connection with the legislation proposed in the House bill of this year, until one would think that the measure was made up of creeks and sloughs, and yet there were only 12 in all, costing the relatively small sum of $192,900 to complete, but accommodating a traffic of 644,664 tons valued at $26,905,739. Can anyone truthfully say that such streams are unworthy of Government aid? If they are not worthy, then our whole policy of river and harbor improvement—a policy based upon the greatest good to the greatest number and which we have been pursuing for the past 20 years—is wrong and vicious.

Mr. Speaker, the work of waterway development by the National Government has been going on for nearly a century. At first it was undertaken with caution, but with our activities in that direction growing and extending, until we have, with the work now under way, perhaps accomplished 75 per cent of that necessary to fit our navigable waterways for the service demanded of them. The most of this work has been done or authorized during the past two decades, we having appropriated during this period over $480,000,000 of the $750,000,000 appropriated for that class of work since the beginning of our Government. The increased activity of recent years has been the result of the liberal policy we have been pursuing since about 1894. For that policy the people alone have been responsible, as we have but reflected their wishes in our legislation here. Neither have the expenditures been unnecessarily wasteful nor the works undertaken lacking in merit, except, perhaps, in a few isolated cases. Indeed, by comparing the work for the improvement of our navigable waterways in this country with those abroad it will be seen that less waste has occurred here, with fewer vicious projects undertaken, than has been the case in foreign countries.

Now, on former occasions here I have undertaken to show that it will require less than a quarter of a century to complete the work yet remaining to be done to place our waterways in such a condition as that they may easily and readily meet the greatest demands of our rapidly growing commerce. Nor will the cost be as heavy as that borne during the past two decades, for while we have appropriated in those years upward of $480,000,000, it will, in my judgment, require less than $450,000,000 to complete all the remaining work, including that under way and that yet to be undertaken. Is it not, then, the part of wisdom to go on to the end under the policy that has brought such magnificent results in the past? To this I think there can be but one answer, and that an affirmative one. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement furnished by the Chief of Engineers, to which I referred some moments ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I presume it is not necessary to do so, but I reserve the balance of my time.

The statements referred to are as follows:

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE PRESENT STATUS OF CERTAIN RIVER AND HARBOR WORKS, AND PROBABLE EFFECT ON OTHERS, IN THE EVENT OF THE FAILURE OF THE PENDING RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

JULY 11, 1914.

The estimates submitted by the Engineer Department in recent years have been submitted on the assumption that there would be a river and harbor act each year, the act to be passed during the long session becoming a law not later than June 30, and that passed during the short session to become a law not later than March 1. Every effort has been made to keep the estimates down to the amounts actually needed to permit of economical prosecution of the works adopted by Congress up to the dates mentioned, and by reason of the regular passage in the past four years of river and harbor acts, confidence that this policy would be continued has been gradually acquired; and not only the Engineer Department, but contractors engaged in furnishing materials or doing work under the department have acquired the same confidence, and have made their plans accordingly.

On account of lack of funds work is now suspended, or will shortly be suspended, on about one-third of the works provided for in the pending river and harbor bill. Should no act be passed at this session, the number of works suspended will be very considerably increased before an act could be passed at the next session of Congress. The suspension of work results not only in positive loss of time and possible interference with navigation, but seriously handicaps and greatly adds to the cost of future work by the disorganization of working forces, and the effect which it has upon the confidence of contractors supplying materials or doing work for the department.

A list is given herewith showing the present status of the work on a considerable number of river and harbor works. Of the works in urgent need of additional funds, attention is particularly invited to the following:

Boston Harbor, Mass., 35-foot channel: While money is on hand to pay all contract requirements for the completion of this channel, there are no funds available for the work of maintaining the completed portions. An estimate of $200,000 was submitted for this work and is carried in the pending bill, and it is very desirable that this amount should be made available at an early day.

Hudson River, N. Y.: This project was adopted in 1910 with a view to completion within a period of four years. Considerable delay was experienced in getting this project started, but the work is now well under way and should be prosecuted without interruption. Unless additional appropriations become available all work carried on with Government plant and hired labor must be suspended by July 15, or such a reorganization of the working force be made necessary as will tend to further delay the completion of the project and increase the ultimate cost. This project is in extension of the New York State Erie Barge Canal, and the lock and channel involved should be available by the time that canal is completed.

Delaware River between Philadelphia and the sea: The existing (35-foot) project is being prosecuted at the rate of over $1,000,000 a year. When the estimate for the current year was submitted it was prepared with the expectation that the appropriation would be made on or before June 30, 1914. Unless additional funds become available at an early day work with Government plant must cease and the present working force be discharged. Work under contract must also be reduced to a minimum in order to cover office expenses and care of plant until work shall be resumed under future appropriations.

Absecon Inlet, N. J., and Wilmington Harbor, Del.: The river and harbor act of 1912 authorized the construction of dredges for these two localities. These dredges will be completed within the next few months, but no funds will be available for their maintenance or operation until provided by Congress.

St. Johns River, Fla.: Unless further funds are provided work with Government plant as at present organized must be suspended about October 1 and the plant laid up or transferred to other localities.

Channel from Apalachicola River to St. Andrews Bay, Fla.: This project was adopted in 1910 and is now near completion, but work with Government plant has already been shut down for lack of funds, and further operations must await additional appropriations. An item of $65,000 for completion of this project is carried in the pending bill.

Black Warrior River, Ala., locks and dams: The pending bill contains an item of $750,000 for the completion of this project. Unless these funds become available at an early day work on Dam No. 17 must be suspended.

Southwest Pass, Mississippi River: No funds are available for purchase of stone for raising the jetties, and this important work must be held in abeyance until additional appropriation is made.

Mississippi River between the Missouri River and Minneapolis, Minn.: This project is being prosecuted with a view to completion within a period of 12 years from 1910, and the estimates are prepared with the understanding that additional funds will be made available on or before June 30 of each year. Part of the work with Government plant has already been stopped, and more will be suspended on July 15. In addition to the loss to the United States incident to the breaking up of the present working force, storage of plant, etc., failure to proceed with the work at this time will entail great hardship on the contractors on account of large quantities of materials gotten together by them on their own responsibility with a view to future contracts, relying on the declared policy of Congress in favor of an annual river and harbor bill.

Monongahela River, Pa.: Work of reconstruction of Lock and Dam No. 6 will be suspended by August 1 unless additional appropriation be made available prior to that date.

Ohio River, locks and dams: Suspension of work by hired labor on this project will be necessary at an early day, as well as postponement of beginning construction of additional locks and dams, unless further appropriations are made available for the prosecution of this project, which is to be completed within a period of 12 years.

Columbia River at The Dalles-Celilo Canal, Oreg.: Work on this project is practically closed, and, as the overhead charges there are high, it would be desirable to shut down immediately and entirely if it were not probable that the appropriation for completion of the work which is carried in the pending bill would become available at an early day.

Coos Bay, Oreg.: Unless funds become earlier available, work of dredging with Government plant will close down before August 1, thus losing a part of the most favorable season for work at this locality.

Columbia River, at the mouth, Oreg. and Wash.: Without additional funds, work on this project must cease about August 15. Suspension of operations in connection with this improvement must be regarded as most unfortunate. The life of the trestle used in dumping rock into the jetty is short at best, and in addition to being expensive in first cost requires heavy expenditures for its upkeep. Deterioration is as rapid when not in use as when work is in progress. Experience has shown that periods of idleness involve very large sums for restoration of plant and equipment and also increased quantities of rock on account of scour at the exposed end of the jetty. Uninterrupted operations are therefore essential to economy and the accomplishment of the best results. Any considerable delay at this time would greatly add to the cost of an already expensive project.

Columbia and lower Willamette Rivers below Portland, Oreg.: An expensive plant has been provided by Congress for use in cooperation with the port of Portland commission in securing and maintaining a 30-foot channel up to Portland. Unless funds are forthcoming this plant must be laid up about September 1.

Grays Harbor and Bar, Wash.: This project is similar to that at the mouth of the Columbia River. The work of repair and maintenance of the jetty trestle will be suspended August 1 unless additional funds are provided.

Mississippi River Commission: While work has not yet been suspended on the Mississippi River between Head of Passes and the mouth of Ohio River, a longer delay in providing additional appropriations will necessitate limiting the work of the commission to dredging and tend to exhaust all reserves for high-water protection works.

The remainder of the list is made up of works smaller in magnitude but perhaps relatively as urgent.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, and ask to have it read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 6, line 11, after the word "of," strike out "$20,000,000" and insert "$5,000,000."

[Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment, practically in the nature of a substitute, that I ask to have read at this time.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the sum of $5,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works: Provided, That allotments for maintenance from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: Provided further, That allotments for the maintenance of the Mississippi River from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the next session of Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amount allotted under this appropriation to each work of maintenance.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be notified at the end of 15 minutes.

I am opposed to the Senate amendment for this reason, among others, that it takes away from Congress the power of saying where this money shall be expended and places it entirely in the control of the Government engineers. When the original river and harbor bill was being discussed in this House and while it was being discussed in the body at the other end of the Capitol, a constant criticism was made that the Government engineers had been unduly influenced or that they were incompetent or that they were biased in their judgment, and that the committees had been influenced in making up the bill by the report of the engineers, and that that influence was what had made the bill largely what was termed a "pork-barrel" proposition.

Now that criticism of the engineers, I think, is entirely unjust. [Applause.] From my experience with the engineers I believe that they are a competent body of men, and I am certain that they are as high-minded and honest as any men in this country. [Applause.] I have never seen the slightest indication to justify any of the criticisms in regard to the engineers, except, of course, in some cases where it was a matter of judgment. Like all other men, they make mistakes in that regard. But criticism of the engineers was the foundation for the criticism of this bill. Yet when it comes back from the Senate we find that those distinguished gentlemen who had been criticizing the engineers finally succeeded in sending it back here with a lump sum of $20,000,000, leaving that to be apportioned entirely by the engineers and take away all control over these expenditures by Congress. If ever there was a "pork-barrel" proposition brought before the Congress, it is this Senate amendment. The "pork" has not been taken out of this bill, if there was any in it at the beginning. It simply has been cut in two, and they come now and ask us to stultify ourselves—we, the members of the committee—and admit that we have been guilty of what they term a "pork-barrel" poposition; that we have been guilty of trading with each other; that we have recommended projects that were unworthy; and ask us to confess that we were trying to loot the Treasury and that we are still willing to take 50 cents on the dollar if we can not get any more.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. If it is just cut in two, will it not be more available if it is designated as to the places where it is to be used?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On the other proposition, if the House bill was grand larceny, this is petty graft; and as between the two I would rather have the dignity of stealing a larger sum.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Not just at this moment, but later on.

The proposition they make is this, and this is the main reason why I am opposed to this bill. Remember that if there was a bad proposition in the House bill or in the Senate bill, it is still there. Not a single proposition has been eliminated from the expenditure of this money. The only difference is that the bad proposition and the good proposition may each get 50 cents instead of a dollar. We have simply cut the proposition in two. But the worst feature of this proposition is this: We propose now to throw the whole matter into a lump sum, and then the man that has the most influence will get the biggest chunk of pork. And they ask self-respecting men on that committee to approve of a proposition of that character. They propose to take the $20,000,000 and place it in a lump sum, and then place it where the man that can bring the most influence on the engineers will get the most money. I say that it is unjust and is unfair to those engineers, who, to a certain extent, hold their positions by favor of Congress. That is, they are in a position where, at least, they can be greatly annoyed; perhaps greatly injured. This $20,000,000 is not sufficient to take care of half of the propositions in this country, and placing upon the engineers the responsibilities under political pressure that will come of deciding as to where that money shall be expended is unjust and dangerous. It is well understood, because the proposition has been talked about—and I am violating no confidences—that certain members of the committee of another body that wanted $20,000,000 as a matter of economy, and are willing to reduce it to that amount, are not willing that Congress shall say where it should be expended. If there were any bad items in the bill, they should be cut out; if there were any items that ought not to be allowed, let those be taken out of the bill. But when these propositions were submitted, the only answer is that it must be a lump sum or else it would never pass the Senate. Well, for one, if we are to be placed in a position where we must stand up and confess that we are not competent to draw a bill, that we are not competent to be trusted with legislation, that we must turn the matter over to the other body in a lump sum in order that they may fight over it and see who shall get the most of it, I am willing here and now, before I consent to such a proposition as that, to resign my place upon the Rivers and Harbors Committee, because we have no longer any reason for our existence. [Applause.]

Now, we have offered an amendment here to reduce it to $5,000,000, and I will tell you why. Because that will take care of the maintenance; that will take care of and prevent any destruction of Government property.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I just want to say that $2,000 000 will do that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, yes; $2,000,000 will do that; $2,000,000 will take care of the maintenance, strictly speaking, but $2,000,000 will not cover all the expenditures that ought to be made in order to prevent the Government from suffering injury.

For illustration, take the $2,700,000 strictly for maintenance. I will give the gentleman an illustration. Under this beautiful proposition that has come back from the Senate you take the work that is going on at the mouth of the Columbia River, which, fortunately, is not in my neighborhood and does not in any way affect me politically. They have their railroad tracks there. They have their buildings assembled. They have a force of five or six hundred men, or had when I was there a year ago. They have their machinery. Now, under this proposition that whole matter stops. We want, in addition to maintenance, sufficient to protect that plant and protect that work until we can get sufficient money to continue it.

And in view of the fact that this pressure has been brought to cut this bill in two, because of the plea that has been made, not openly, but underneath the surface, that the war abroad has brought on a condition where we must economize, if we are going to economize and cut some propositions and stop work on part of the river and harbor projects of this country in the name of economy, why not treat all alike and economize by stopping work on all of them? [Applause on the Republican side.] Why not stop all constructive work, if we are going to stop part, and simply provide sufficient money to protect the projects from deterioration?

We are told that the river and harbor appropriations shall be cut in two so that we can economize, so that we will not have to tax the people $105,000,000 more. Yet, following after this bill, we are to have a ship-subsidy bill, and a ship-subsidy bill brought in by a Democratic majority—a ship-subsidy bill that proposes to subsidize ships built in foreign yards by foreign cheap labor, officered by foreigners, and manned by Chinese.

They propose to subsidize that kind of shipping. They have gone far beyond what any Republican ever advocated. I presume that I have been as persistent an advocate of ship subsidies as any man in the United States, but the Democratic proposition is far too much for me. If it comes to a time when, in order to get a merchant marine, we must buy foreign ships, built by foreign cheap labor and manned by foreigners and then subsidize them, I am unwilling to pay the price. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Then, we are talking about economy and must keep down the rivers and harbors bill and can not take care of the great improvements of our country in the interest of commerce, and yet there is standing back in the shadow a treaty whereby $25,000,000 of the people's money is to be taken and paid to Colombia to mollify her feelings because we refused to be blackmailed by that country. Now, I wonder how much sincerity there is on this side of the House when you go to talking economy, when it comes down directly to your own propositions. I have seen men on that side of the House for the last 12 years standing up and orating against subsidies, but I never saw one, either upon that side of the House nor one on this side of the House, that ever voted against a proposition to expend money in his own district. And I am going to give you gentleman a chance to show whether you are in favor of it now. I have discovered, since I have been a Member of this House, that the difference between "a subsidy" and "a wise expenditure of the public money" depends upon who gets it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the rest of my time, unless somebody wants to ask me a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a question, if he will permit.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would not the expenditure of $20,000,000 as a lump sum by the Board of Engineers result in extreme criticism and the discrediting of that board after the expenditure, no matter how well they tried to expend it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes. Let me answer that by giving my colleague a few of the facts, without mentioning any names. The reason why this lump-sum proposition is here—and I speak advisedly—is because certain distinguished gentlemen could not agree upon how it was to be divided, and they did agree to throw it all into a pot and take their chances on getting what they thought was their part afterwards. That is the truth about it, and that is the reason why we have a lump sum here, instead of dividing it. The very moment they attempt to parcel out this $20,000,000, then trouble commences, because every man wants his project taken care of. You can imagine what this is going to lead to when you appropriate this $20,000,000 in a lump sum. It will not be on the statute books 15 minutes before the engineer's office will be crowded with Senators and Representatives demanding that their projects, at least, be taken care of. It is the most disgraceful proposition that has ever been submitted to Congress since I have been here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply interested in this bill, because my constituents are interested in it, and also because I recognize that it is one of very great importance to the transportation interests of the country. It is generally confessed to-day that water transportation is the cheapest known to commerce, and the improvement of inland waterways is one of the most important questions of the age. It was believed that this bill as it passed the House would do very much to promote the cause of transportation and of commerce over the waterways of this country, and I, with many others in the Mississippi Valley, am greatly disappointed by the action of the other branch of Congress in adopting this amendment.

Like the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who has just spoken, I regret exceedingly that the Senate has seen fit to reduce this appropriation from $53,000,000 to $20,000,000, but I do not fully appreciate his logic when he objects to the reduction from $53,000,000 to $20,000,000 and then seeks to further reduce it by offering an amendment proposing to place it at $5,000,000. I agree with him that I would much prefer that Congress should control the allotments of this money rather than that it should be done by the Secretary of War and the Government engineers. Still I am for this bill now, because I understand from the chairman of the committee and from other sources of information that it is a question of this bill or no bill at all at this session of Congress. Moreover, I have confidence in the ability and judgment of the Government engineers, and believe that they will place the money where most needed and where it will do the most good.

In the district where I live, with five counties bordering upon the Mississippi River, the matter of water transportation is one of the very greatest importance, and especially to-day, since the Panama Canal is completed, as we hope in the early future to see the products of the soil and of the factory in that section loaded upon ships that will carry their cargoes to all the markets of the civilized world without change. While these appropriations are made, as I understand and appreciate, for the purpose of improving the channels of the rivers and for the purpose of navigation, still there are incidental benefits of very great importance that our country appreciates and that are of great value to my constituents.

The country in which I live is sometimes overflowed, and in the last two years we have had floods from the Mississippi River which were unprecedented in the history of this country that destroyed property worth many millions of dollars. I understand that levees are not constructed exclusively for the purpose of protecting property, but primarily to aid navigation; still they do protect the flooded country from these annual overflows and are of incalculable value to the thousands of citizens who reside behind them. There are growing cities of great importance and wealth that are sometimes menaced by caving banks, and revetment of the river banks in many cases is proper and important. I regret that the $20,000,000 carried in this bill seems to be all we can get at this session of Congress, but I realize that it is only a short time, only a little more than two months, until the next regular session of Congress will convene, and I have every reason to hope that this amount will take care of the most important improvements now required until Congress shall convene in regular session in December. So in supporting this bill to-day it is not as a matter of choice, as between the bill originally passed by the House and this bill, but it is because it seems to be the only bill that can be passed at this session of Congress, and as such I heartily approve it and support it. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENNEDY] use some of his time now?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to myself.

I regret that I can not vote with the majority of the committee to concur in the Senate amendment to the rivers and harbors bill. While I believe in river and harbor improvements as a general proposition, we are confronted at this time with a condition in the country brought about by the falling off of the revenues that calls for the practice of the most rigid economy in governmental expenditures.

The Senate amendment provides that a lump sum of $20,000,000 shall be appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor work and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation and most economical and advantageous in the execution of the work. The amendment cuts out all new projects provided for in the House bill and eliminates the surveys authorized in that measure. You will notice there is no limitation in the amendment on the amount that may be allotted to any project, the only condition being that the project on which the money is to be expended must have been previously authorized. It leaves the whole matter in the discretion of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers as to the amount that shall be spent on the various works now being prosecuted. If there is any ground for the criticism made of the Engineer's Office in another body, this amendment would only accentuate it, for under its provisions the engineers can allot any sum to any project which has been authorized up to the amount necessary to complete the project.

Now, I am opposed to large lump-sum appropriations for any department of the Government, for I believe such a policy breeds extravagance and is inimical to the economical administration of governmental affairs. [Applause on the Republican side.] Now, what will happen in case this amendment is agreed to and the bill becomes a law in its present form. The Engineer's Office will be overwhelmed by requests from Members of Congress and organizations in localities that are interested in works that are now being prosecuted for more liberal allotments than the urgency of the work being carried on would merit, and sufficient pressure will be brought to bear in some cases to allot sums from this fund to projects where it is not most urgently needed in the interest of navigation. I am opposed to this amendment because I do not believe such a large sum is needed at this time. How was the amount of $20,000,000 arrived at as being the necessary amount to carry on the work until the funds of the next rivers and harbors bill should become available? Was there any investigation made on the part of the Engineer's Office to ascertain the amount that would be required to tide over the work for the few months until the next bill becomes a law? There was not; in fact, the engineers are quoted as saying that it would require some three weeks to acquire sufficient data to tell just what amount was needed. If the policy of yearly bills is to be continued, the next one must become a law before the 4th of March, and as amounts carried in the rivers and harbors bills are available from the time the bill becomes a law the next bill will provide funds in ample time to resume work early in the spring, which bill can be made up based on accurate data furnished by the Engineer's Office.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think that the appropriation of $20,000,000 at this time will lead to the expenditure of money in certain sections of the country, by reason of the fact that frost and ice will prevent any work being done in other sections of the country?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think so. Conditions in the Northern States are such that navigation closes about the middle of November, and after this money is allotted it will be impossible to accomplish anything on any project where the climate is rigorous.

Mr. MOORE. If the $20,000,000 is appropriated speedily, and the engineers get to work speedily, as they undoubtedly will, they will be able to finish up certain projects in sections of the country that are not subjected to climatic rigors, so that at least some work could be done in those parts of the country before the season closes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes; some work could be done in those places. But take the case of the upper Mississippi. Work has been suspended there already, crews laid off, and fleets laid up. Now, by the time this money is allotted there will not be more than 15 or 20 days before navigation closes, and they can not accomplish anything to speak of in the northern part of the country this season.

Mr. MOORE. Then during the months of November, December, January, February, and March, in the judgment of the gentlemen, there would be very little work done in the Northern States. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think little, if anything, could be done.

Mr. MOORE. Then is it the thought of the gentleman that the bulk of the money would go into States that are not affected by these climatic conditions and rigors?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I should think if the money is to be expended before the money in the next appropriation bill is available, it will necessarily have to be expended largely in terr' ory not affected by winter conditions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The gentleman does not consider, however, that that would be an objection to appropriating a sum of money to be expended by the engineers? In other words, I do not suppose his objection to the lump sum is based upon the idea that there might or would be frost in one section and none in another?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have stated heretofore two or three of my reasons that were not along that line. But we have a right to expect equal treatment to all parts of the country.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Of course the gentleman understands that there could not be equal treatment if conditions would not permit work to be carried on in northern latitudes during the winter months. I want to add that none of us here in the House, neither the chairman or other members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, are responsible for the fact that this work has not been going on during the time of the year when the money could have been properly and judiciously expended on projects in more northerly latitudes.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. But the condition exists, and the money would be chiefly expended in the South.

Mr. SPARKMAN. In other words, I do not think sectionalism should enter into the matter at all, and I hope it may not.

Mr. MANN. It has.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Now, it is contended that great loss will ensue to the Government if this sum is not provided at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to myself five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not believe that any great loss would be sustained if this bill should fail to pass. It has been generally understood for months that no rivers and harbors bill would pass at this session of Congress, and members of the committee joined in this belief. Now, when there is a probability that no additional funds will be provided, or rather that the rivers and harbors bill will fail of passage, before the funds are completely exhausted in the various districts a sufficient amount is set aside to keep intact the organization, so there will be no delay in resuming work when additional funds are provided.

It is claimed that contractors who engage in river and harbor work will sustain losses if this bill does not pass. As the law prohibits the engineers from entering into contracts for river and harbor work unless the funds are available to pay for same or the contract is authorized, in which case it is carried in the sundry civil bill; so that no work can be contracted for unless funds are on hand or in sight at the time the contracts are entered into. So that contractors would not be affected on any work being prosecuted at this time. I take it that they have felt as we have felt—that there would be no rivers and harbors bill at this session and have "trimmed their sails" to meet such a contingency.

The House bill was passed on March 26 and went to the Senate, where it remained for six months waiting action by that body. The bill was before the Senate practically the whole time that river and harbor work could be carried on in the northern part of the country. Take the upper Mississippi, where I am somewhat familiar with conditions. Part of the work was suspended early in the summer owing to a lack of funds, and for some time the fleets which have had this work in charge have been laid up and the crews scattered so that it would be absolutely impossible by the time it could be arranged to resume work to accomplish anything this season, because navigation closes about November 15; and if this bill should pass it would not be possible to do anything on the upper Mississippi River project and no funds would be required to carry them over until the next rivers and harbors bill becomes a law. I take it that the condition on the upper Mississippi is typical of conditions in the Northern States, where very little work could be done even if we should provide the twenty millions contemplated in this amendment.

It seems to me if a war tax is to be levied to raise a hundred millions of dollars that we should retrench in every way possible, and that here is an opportunity to practice it. [Applause on the Republican side.] I do not believe the country will approve of appropriations that are not absolutely necessary and that can be very well postponed until some future time.

The proposed war tax at 2 cents per gallon will mean a yearly burden on the people of the State, which in part I have the honor to represent, based on the consumption of gasoline in the State for the past year, of $1,500,000, and that is only taking into consideration the increase of 2 cents per gallon, which is the amount of the tax levied, and in all probability the increase to the consumer will be even greater than that amount.

Iowa has some 200 more banks than any State in the Union, and under the proposed war tax the capital stock and surplus of these institutions will also be taxed. Our people will also be taxed under almost every other provision of the war-tax bill. I do not believe the people of my State or the people of the country will approve of this appropriation of $20,000,000 at this time without any data on which to base it, and I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Washington for an appropriation sufficient to maintain the work which is now being prosecuted, and which I believe is all that is necessary to be done at this time.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, for two minutes, in which to place before the House two telegrams that I have received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for two minutes to place before the House two telegrams.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask if that will come out of the time allotted here to-day?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can only get time by having it yielded to him.

Mr. HOBSON. I will ask each of the two gentlemen to give me one minute.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the gentleman ask it from his own side of the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to place before the House two telegrams protesting against the emergency revenue bill. They are as follows:

LAWRENCEVILLE, ILL., September 26, 1914.

Hon. RICHMOND P. HOBSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Southern Illinois conference of 225 pastors of 50,000 Methodists voted unanimous protest against Underwood liquor revenue increase.

WILBUR H. THIRKELD.
Bishop J. C. KIMSON, Secretary.

PORTLAND, OREG., September 25, 1914.

Hon. RICHMOND P. HOBSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The Oregon Methodist Episcopal conference, in annual session assembled and representing a constituency of over 50,000 citizens of Oregon, do earnestly protest against the passage of the Underwood bill to add increased revenue tax on beer and domestic wines, thus making the Government more dependent upon liquor revenues and thereby increasing the power of the liquor interests in national affairs. We sincerely call upon all Oregon Congressmen and Senators to use their utmost endeavors to secure the defeat or radical amendment of this bill.

RICHARD J. COOKE.
Presiding Bishop of the Oregon Conference.
C. C. RARICK, Secretary.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

[Mr. LINTHICUM addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILSON].

[Mr. WILSON of Florida addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested during my entire career in the improvement of inland waterways. I believe that in such a country as ours, with a great inland commerce and a vast extent of inland region remote from the seaboard, transportation is our greatest problem.

[Applause.] It will, I think, always be the greatest problem of this great Nation.

I regard the improvement of inland waterways as one of the great means of solving the problem of the constant pressure upon the transportation facilities of this Nation. I regret to see a wholesale attack made on the river and harbor bill prepared by a committee of this House on the ground that it is a pork-barrel measure designed purely to loot the Public Treasury in the interest of the private political fortunes of some of the Members. I should much prefer to have seen, and would have had much more confidence in the attack made on the bill, if the gentlemen could have pointed out and eliminated in the interest of the public the measures that they claim were unworthy in that bill. [Applause.]

I confess that it is only with the utmost regret that I shall vote for the Senate amendment to the river and harbor bill. I would not do it under any other circumstances than the circumstances that now present themselves. These circumstances are that projects have been authorized by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of this Congress; that these projects have been adopted with the consent of Congress, work begun upon them, and that work has come to a standstill because of the delay and failure of Congress to provide the necessary means.

In this situation the only solution with which we are confronted is either a wholesale cessation of the work or a lump sum placed at the disposal of the River and Harbor Board of the War Department. Of these two evils there can be but one choice, and for those interested in the permanent and continuous development of our inland waterways that is to choose the lesser of the two evils and accept a lump-sum appropriation placed in the hands of the board of engineers.

I hope Congress will never be confronted with that situation again, but will understand before a river and harbor bill is taken up in the future that the projects are to pass under the watchful eye of the representatives of the people, and that we are not to be confronted with another lump-sum appropriation. I am as much opposed to lump-sum appropriations as is the gentleman from Washington, and I can only conceive of their being acceptable to this House as a temporary expedient to tide over an emergency in which we now find ourselves.

I represent a project in the river and harbor bill which I not only regret, but resent hearing classed in a wholesale denunciation as a pork-barrel bill. I want to say to this House that I intend to put in as a part of my remarks a statement by men actively engaged in transportation on the Missouri River from Kansas City to St. Louis showing that 3,000 tons of freight are to-day moving down that river every month, and of that 3,000 tons of freight 65 per cent of it consists of wheat and flour. [Applause.] That shows that this is no pork barrel, but, if anything, that it is a great bread basket, for the improvement of that river has done what its friends said it would. It has opened up the granary of the West, has taken the farmers' wheat and the flour made from it and has provided the facilities by which it goes out to the Gulf for shipment to the Atlantic seaboard. The 3,000 tons of freight going down the Missouri River monthly is the direct product of the farms of the West and mills in the small towns of Missouri and Kansas. That transportation line on the Missouri River to-day is refusing to take tonnage of freight at St. Louis because its equipment has not kept pace with the demand for transportation facilities on that river. Under these conditions I resent the wholesale denunciation of the river and harbor bill as a pork-barrel measure.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS. Has not the improvement of the Missouri River greatly reduced the freight rates on the railroads on all classes of freight?

Mr. BORLAND. I will say this, that the freight rates on the traffic actually carried is 80 per cent of the railway rates, and that 80 per cent absorbs the switching charges at terminals, so that it is a net saving to the shipper of 20 per cent. There has been a reduction from Mississippi River points and from Chicago to southern Kansas and Colorado, based partly on the improvement of facilities for water transportation, but there has been no general reduction in the local freight rates on the river, because the volume of traffic has more than kept pace with the facilities for transportation.

KANSAS CITY, MO., June 4, 1914.

PROJECT.

The Kansas City Missouri River Navigation Co. has a capital of $1,202,000, subscriptions payable on the installment plan; slightly over $1,000,000 paid in to date. The capital is divided into $2,000 common stock and $1,200,000 preferred, the common stock having full voting power and being owned in equal amounts by the 13 directors.

Printed copy of articles of association attached explains nature of corporation.

FLOATING EQUIPMENT.

Two towboats, 7 cargo box barges, and 1 packet and passenger steamer, all having steel hulls and the barges being steel throughout, absolutely fireproof, and all hulls having water-tight compartments for purposes of safety. Total horsepower of boats, 1,900; total carrying capacity of barges, 5,400 tons.

TERMINAL EQUIPMENT.

At the Kansas City terminal the city has provided a modern municipal wharf and warehouse, with mechanical freight devices; cost, $75,000. Wharf is 526 feet long and 50 feet wide; warehouse 306 feet long and 40 feet wide, of steel mill-building construction, cement on metal lath, rubberoid roof, wharf and warehouse served by switch track to facilitate interchange of freight between water and rail.

At East St. Louis the company owns warehouse and wharf of modern design, equipped with modern freight-handling device, and served by switch track connected with all lines entering East St. Louis and St. Louis. For repair and quartering of boats the company has a shipyard at the mouth of the Kansas River, Kansas City, Kans., and one at the mouth of the Gasconade River, Gasconade, Mo.

OPERATIONS.

The packet steamer Chester carries passengers and freight between Kansas City and St. Louis, also serving the local points.

The towboats A. M. Scott and Advance, tow barges, carrying freight between Kansas City and St. Louis, operating night and day on the uptrip and daylight only on the down trip. Night operating downstream may safely be done when in improved stretches of the river, where the dangers of shifting channels are obviated.

Freight upstream averages 65 per cent third class and higher, the remaining 35 per cent being lower than third class. This is a very high average, and we do not know of any transportation company whose records will show equally good. This freight consists largely of dry goods, pianos, notions, hardware, groceries, steel and wire products, furniture, window and plate glass (in large quantities), chemicals, queensware, druggists' sundries, etc.; in fact, almost as varying as rail movement.

Downstream freight consists of export flour and grain products, live-stock, and miscellaneous manufactured articles.

Our experience as to loss and damage claims shows about one-fourth in amount compared to a relative rail movement.

Most of the westbound freight comes to us in carloads from eastern lines, direct to our dock, where it is transferred by electric telpher and conveyer direct to boats and barges. On arrival at Kansas City the carloads are transferred to cars and switched to industries and warehouses having track connection. This gives the consignee exactly the same service as would be received from a rail line and enables us to secure freight which would not move by boat if it were necessary for the consignee to accept delivery at the river front.

Since the filing of our grain-products tariff with the Interstate Commerce Commission this spring we have had practically full-capacity loads of export flour downstream.

RATES.

Our rates are uniformly 20 per cent less than rail rates between the same points, and this rate includes the necessary switching of carloads to and from industries having track connection; in other words, shipments on our line show a net saving in freight of 20 per cent between the points we reach.

TONNAGE.

Last season we handled only 10,000 tons of freight, most of which was handled prior to July 15. After that date the stage of river was very low, due largely to the drouth west of us, and a great deal of channel difficulty was experienced. Government reports show the lowest stage of water after July 15, 1913, that has occurred in the past 20 years. At present we are handling over 3,000 tons per month, due partly to the securing of full capacity downstream and partly to increased equipment. The volume during June and July will show an increase due to the better stage of water prevailing during these months. Another reason for increased freight movement is the greater familiarity of operating men with the channel and general operating conditions. Young and active men are being attracted to river navigation and the organization is becoming more efficient from year to year. The river, having been in disuse for so many years, attracted very few men of the right caliber to the service, and it has been necessary to develop an operating force. The benefit from the volume of freight handled is enhanced by the average high class of freight, as, of course, the saving per ton is much greater on the higher classes.

RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

The $4,400,000 appropriated by Congress for river improvement since the beginning of this enterprise has been expended in contracts for systematic improvement of the river between Kansas City and its mouth, a distance of 390 miles. Such sections as have been improved now have permanent channels of 6 feet and greater depth, and have very materially aided navigation. Larger contracting firms have been attracted to this work, which means a more rapid completion of the contracts, and the Government has very materially enlarged its own fleet so as to be able to accomplish a great deal more work. There remain a number of bad sections along the river which can not be improved until they are reached under the systematic continuing plan of improvement, but the elimination of the "pork barrel" means an earlier completion of the whole work at less cost to the Government.

PUBLIC INTEREST.

While this company is fortified with freight contracts from the larger shippers, guaranteeing a portion of their tonnage for a period of years, it has not been necessary to resort to these contracts to secure freight, and our list of shippers is gradually increasing, based on the merits of the service and the actual saving in freight rates.

CONCLUSION.

From the standpoint of boat service, increased operating efficiency, improvement freight handling, river improvement, and tonnage increase the development all along the line is encouraging to the point of assuring success in the restoration of river commerce in a large way, to the benefit of the Missouri Valley, Kansas City, and surrounding territory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman from Washington use some of his time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, what amazes me in this whole transaction is the docility of the House. More than six months ago we passed the river and harbor bill, three hundred and ninety odd Representatives of the people, coming directly from them and undertaking to represent them in matters of this kind.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman speaks of the docility of the House. Does he mean in reference to this matter or the general docility of the House?

Mr. MOORE. I refer to this particular matter at this particular time, because if there has ever been an exhibition of greater docility and subservience on the part of the House than in the matter of the river and harbor bill, I have failed to observe it.

Apparently we are to yield to the dictation of another body, not to the whole body, because half of it seems to have been asleep for the whole of the six months during which the House bill was before that body. Indeed we are to yield to the dictation of only three or four men, one or two of whom knew what they were talking about, and the others of whom knew little about it, except that they had discovered something which a few of the newspapers denominated a "pork barrel." And it is a difficult thing for some men who love sensations to resist the newspapers on such a proposition.

Mr. Speaker, all river and harbor bills, since I have been a Member of this House, have been framed in substantially the same way that this river and harbor bill was framed. The representatives of the people, voicing the sentiments of their constituencies, did what they could before the House committee to obtain recognition for what they believed to be needful projects, and those projects were included in the House bill, just as they have been included from time immemorial.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was the bill that passed in 1907 framed in the same way that this bill was; along the same lines by those who had charge of it then?

Mr. MOORE. Substantially the same. The gentleman may be putting a catch question——

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE. But I want to be just as broad in this matter as though I were a Member of his side of the House. There is positively no difference between the conditions under which this river and harbor bill of 1914 was framed and the conditions under which the bill of 1907 was framed. It may be and probably is true that the party now in power took care of its own a little more than was done in the bill of 1907, but my recollection is that those sections of the country which have been fairly well recognized in this bill of 1914 were also very well taken care of in 1907. If we were to use the Mississippi River as an illustration, the stream that has taken the bulk of the appropriations, we would probably find that it was cared for by appropriation in 1907 very much as it is to-day, except that the appropriation is larger.

The House acted. It passed a bill which it was believed met the needs of the situation. It was not an unreasonable bill in amount, because the sentiment of the country had come to demand an annual river and harbor bill and the completion of work already undertaken. This bill went to the Senate; there it slumbered for six months, the majority party making no effort to pass it until the European war broke out and the cry of economy was raised. Then it was taken up in the face of those tactics which led on to filibustering "heroics," which delighted the sensational newspapers of the land.

Here and there from the great editorial sanctums came statements indicating that there was "pork" in this bill. The editors were aroused to the news features of the discussion and treated the well-known and well-worn river and harbor facts as a revelation. Unmindful of the history of river and harbor bills, they helped along the general fund of misinformation.

The Senate finally sent the bill back, but in such form that it is practically an instruction to the House to pass it as the Senate indicates. They had six months on the other side to consider it, six months to cull it and disarm it, if it had anything in it that was improper, but they sent it back without analyzing a single item or permitting a single item to stand. The Senate dispenses with the House bill in toto and submits an amendment providing for a lump-sum appropriation. If the House accepts the Senate amendment, it takes away from both bodies, the Senate and the House, all right to appropriate the public funds for rivers and harbors. An administrative body is given full power in the amendment to appropriate the money of the Government. The legislative body, which is empowered by the Constitution to exercise legislative functions, delegates its power to one of the executive departments. More than that, it specifies the Corps of Engineers to have exclusive jurisdiction over a lump sum, and thus subjects it to all of the embarrassments that result from logrolling and political influence, which perhaps are just as vicious in their way as is what is commonly called the "pork barrel." The Senate amendment does not correct the so-called "pork barrel"; it merely transfers the matter of rivers and harbors from an alleged "pork-barrel" system to a new system of logrolling and political influence, which must now be withstood by one of the departments. [Applause.] In other words, the Congress of the United States will have abdicated its power and will have itself submitted to a voluntary infraction of the Constitution of the United States if it passes this amendment as the Senate undertakes to cram it down our throats.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any man is going to make a great reputation from long night sessions or sleepless filibusters if he destroys what the people of this country want. [Applause.] I am satisfied that the people of the country, whether the party in power is erring in this respect or not, want a river and harbor bill, because it represents inland transportation competition with railroad transportation, because it means more economic living, and because it is calculated to develop trade and commerce which now lie dormant in many instances, due to the inaction of Congress. The amount of money expended on rivers and harbors in the United States is insignificant compared with what is expended by other countries. The single State of New York, over yonder, has expended more than $140,000,000 upon one canal of its own, and that $140,000,000 is as much as the whole Government of the United States had expended up to 1907 on all of the rivers and harbors in all of the States along the Atlantic seaboard from Maine to Florida, east of the Appalachian chain, since the beginning of our history.

At the single port of New York we take in in customs every year $210,000,000, which is distributed to the entire country for various purposes, and some of it surely should find its way into those internal improvements which tend to promote trade in all the States.

Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from a very unusual convention that had something to say on this subject, a convention along the Hudson Valley, where the people turned out in great numbers because they learned that Congress proposed to stop work upon certain projects already begun. They lined the river banks on either side for 150 miles; whole cities poured out their residents, who gave open and earnest expression of protest against the failure of a river and harbor bill this year. And why? Up yonder in New York State, between Albany and Troy, a distance of 6 miles, and a little below Albany, is a barrier to commerce. The State of New York has expended its $140,000,000 bringing the Great Lakes from Duluth and Chicago and Detroit down to the Atlantic Ocean through hundreds of miles of canalization.

The Government has made a belated effort to deepen the Hudson River from the Atlantic Ocean to Troy and Albany to connect with this great barge system across the State to the Great Lakes. There on Friday last was presented to the people of this country, particularly to those who were so unfortunate as to see it, a spectacle that ought to make American Congressmen ashamed. A torpedo boat of the Government, one of the lightest in draft, going 150 miles up the Hudson River with the view of reaching the approach to the New York State Barge Canal, was stuck in the mud. It could not move because the appropriations of Congress had failed to keep the channel clear. One hundred and fifty miles this side to the ocean, hundreds of miles already improved by a single State to the west, all waiting to be connected, and yet a small intervening barrier which this Government has failed to remove blocks it all. It is a shame; and yet, sitting in 25-story skyscrapers in New York, we have seen great editors writing editorials approving the filibusters and giving out sensational statements to all the people that because of a "pork barrel" a rivers and harbors bill should not pass. [Applause.] The people of the Hudson Valley set some fires under those editorial offices, they set some fires under the magazine writers, and I question whether they will be quite so conspicuous hereafter in cutting out their own appropriations in New York and up the Hudson as they have been heretofore.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that certain sections of the country were favored in this bill. The party in power being voted into power by the people doubtless did take care of itself. I have been one of those on the Republican side who has not found fault with the party in power for taking "its own" when it could get it. I have rather expected it would, but I do believe without regard to politics that every dollar spent upon river and harbor improvements in this country has been well spent. [Applause.] While I object to abdicating my place here as a Member of Congress and dedicating to an administrative officer the law-making power the people conferred upon me, though I have every confidence in the Army engineers and will sing their praise as loud as any, I object to and I protest against the senatorial action which puts that body of engineers in charge of the distribution of public money without regard to Congress. [Applause.]

I believe that rivers and harbors money is well spent. Instances could be cited without number to prove the return the Government gets out of every dollar it spends in this way. Over on the Delaware River in my State work has been stopped. The dredges have been taken off because, perchance, some gentlemen in the Senate and possibly some in the House have been indulging in a filibuster with a view to stopping appropriations. What is the result? The river is beginning to fill up. It collects in customs receipts for the Government approximately $20,000,000 a year. It must be maintained. No highway was ever built of macadam or of concrete that did not have to be repaired. No house was ever constructed that did not have to be cleaned. No river will ever be dredged without having to be maintained, and the man who insists that maintenance is costly and seeks to stop work on that account simply does not know the ordinary necessities of conducting a great business. The channel must be cleared. The clearing of the channel must be paid for. Obstructions will form, and they must be removed, and this costs money.

I say it costs money to clear away the obstructions in channels; it costs money to connect rivers by canalization; it costs money to dredge out harbors, but if we do not dredge out New York, if we do not dredge out Portland, if we do not dredge out Philadelphia, if we do not dredge out Boston or Savannah, we do not get the returns into the coffers of the United States that modern civilization and modern business methods require. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. May I have five minutes additional?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. MOORE. And if we do not spend money, pray what becomes of it? It does no good to hoard it. In the present instance by stopping the expenditure of money upon rivers and harbors the filibusters have accomplished two things. Where we had contract work the contractors have had to discharge their men and get off the job and there has been great waste and loss resulting from it. Over at Troy, on the Hudson, a great dam, intended to complete the work connecting the commerce between the Great Lakes and the Hudson River has been stopped in midstream. The waters are rushing by and disintegration is taking place. That is what filibustering brings in its wake when Congress indulges it. Over yonder in the Delaware, of which I have knowledge, the stream is silting up. That is what filibustering brings to the Government and to us. It is the same story at the mouth of the Columbia on the Pacific. Work has been stopped and loss sets in. If a contractor discharges his men and they go off and look for work elsewhere, especially at this time, when men are in need of work, what becomes of the Government employees? I am informed there are about 30,000 men altogether engaged in river and harbor work. Many of these have already been turned aside. The working organization of the Government to a certain extent has been disorganized. What good has been done must stop temporarily. It will take time and money to pick it up again. It is not an extravagance to say that if no river and harbor bill is passed by this session of Congress there will be at least 200,000 souls that have depended upon the breadwinners employed upon river and harbor work that may have to look elsewhere for support. This is another achievement of the filibusterers.

Mr. Speaker, the money that is spent, even if some of it goes as "pork" to a little stream, in the river and harbor bill is spent in this country, thank God, and goes into circulation amongst our own people. It is not lost. [Applause.] But it is lost to our own people when we spend it in the building of foreign ships or the buying of foreign ships at the expense of our own industries. The money we spend upon rivers and harbors of this country is spent upon ourselves, and the main question is to see that it is fairly and wisely apportioned.

As an advocate of improved waterways in this country, I do not desire to see the river and harbor bill fail. If, however, I dealt with this question only as an agitator, I might regard it as good politics to have it fail, because if all work should be suddenly stopped, there would be such an uprising of men and women engaged in trade and commerce in this country as would bring to Congress an expression of the will of the people that could not be forgotten. It would lead to some prompt and systematic method by which hereafter the Government would take care of its own enterprises.

But, Mr. Speaker, I dislike to encourage waste. I would rather have a crumb than no bread at all; and even if we are to be crowded to the wall, even if our prerogative as legislators is to be taken away, even if the Senate is to force the House to admit that everything above $20,000,000 in its original policy is "pork barrel" and graft, even if there is to be a confession by the party in power that it yields under fire, I am about ready to take what will come, so that at least some men in this country may have employment and at least some of the uncompleted projects may go on and the waste due to a needless filibuster may stop. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I, too, have been impressed by the docility of this House in the present consideration of this bill. I had asked for a few moments in order to offer an amendment, but I understand that a colleague from Massachusetts has in mind the same amendment to offer, and as he is a member of the committee which has this bill in charge, I shall defer to him. Of course it is an amendment which we hope may bring some good to Boston Harbor.

While I am on my feet I want to call to the attention of this House the fact that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to-day is spending $11,000,000 of its own money on the development of the port of Boston. We have been told that altruism with regard to port development is that each port should have a channel suitable to the kind of vessels which are attracted and in service to it. Now, if Boston merely had the freighters or the tramp steamers drawing 25 feet or so of water, of course she would not need 40 feet in her channel. But Boston has the combination passenger and freight boats, the big boats, in fact. And I know this House will be surprised to learn that of the 172 commercial vessels in the whole world 500 feet and over, during 1913, 27 of those vessels were in service in Boston. In short, almost one-sixth of the vessels of the world 500 feet long and over were in service in our harbor.

In the last 40 years the State of Massachusetts has contributed most generously. The port directors of Boston have $4,000,000 to spend on the development of that harbor, and they ask the cooperation of the Federal Government. Why, Mr. Chairman, the largest dry dock in the world is in the course of construction at Boston at the present day. It is to be 1,200 feet long, 150 feet wide, and able to accommodate the largest vessels afloat or projected. There is not a dry dock on the Atlantic coast big enough to take several of the largest steamships now coming to our ports.

It is not fair to Boston and it is not fair to the steamship companies when they put in service to Boston a vessel capable of loading to 34 feet that the ship can only be loaded to 31 feet at the most, for the difference of 3 feet in vessels of the type in service to Boston would carry practically one-third more cargo with comparatively little increase of cost for operation, and this 3 feet either makes it profitable or unprofitable for that ship to trade to Boston.

The 35-foot channel at Boston is only the equivalent of a 30-foot channel or less, for at low tide, with an off-shore wind, there is a minus tide of 2 or 3 feet which brings the 35-foot channel down to 32 or 33 feet.

A vessel under way has a "squat" in the water of about 3 feet, bringing the 33-foot channel down to 30 feet, so far as this vessel is concerned, and the boat should be entitled at least to a couple of feet more under her keel as a matter of safety, which still further reduces the available depth to 28 feet.

Fourteen of the trans-Atlantic lines at Boston carry passengers varying from a few hundred to a few thousand, and, as a matter of safety, the channel should be deepened, and also, as a matter of expedition, for Boston's nearness to Europe of 190 miles, as against the nearest Atlantic port to the south (New York), is appreciably diminished if the boats at Boston must wait for the tide to enter or leave port.

It is not fair to Boston to have such conditions exist, particularly when the State of Massachusetts is spending millions to develop the port of Boston and particularly when so much of the prosperity of New England and the very life of the industries there depend upon the speedy, cheap transportation facilities best supplied by the big combination passenger and freight boats.

The 1912 report of the Rotterdam Chamber of Commerce and the March, 1914, publication from the Port of London Authority, giving the net tonnage of shipping entering the various ports, prove that Boston is now the second port in North or South America and the fifth largest in the entire world.

The latest figures obtainable are those for 1912, and show the net tonnage of shipping, foreign and coastwise, entering the ports to be as follows:

New York (estimated)	22,367,103
London	16,561,094
Hamburg	13,797,000
Rotterdam	12,094,030
Boston	11,755,071
Antwerp	11,608,000
Liverpool	10,590,291

The port of Boston, following closely after New York, London, Hamburg, and Rotterdam, now outranks such world-wide ports as Antwerp and Liverpool.

Boston in 1912 had 3,061,733 net tons of shipping in the foreign trade and 8,693,338 net tons of shipping in the coastwise trade, making a total of 11,755,071.

This was still further increased in 1913 to 12,182,759 net tons, a gain of 427,688 net tons of shipping in one year.

The foreign trade of the port last year was $260,482,097, a gain of $25,563,122 over 1912.

Of this $260,000,000, $85,712,088 was exports and $174,770,009 was imports, foreign and domestic; $44,332,457 was Canadian business.

The port of Boston has more than contributed her share to the running expenses of the Federal Government, providing an average of $25,000,000 a year for the past six years.

The customs dues collected at Boston in 1913 were $23,789,690.82.

Boston has 49 steamship lines, foreign and coastwise, to and from all parts of the world.

Thirty-five of these lines are in the foreign trade running to and from Liverpool, London, Manchester, Glasgow, Hull, Fowey, Antwerp, Rotterdam, Hamburg, Bremen, Copenhagen, Libau, Christiania and Gothenburg, Trieste and Adriatic ports, Barcelona and Almeria, the Mediterranean, Calcutta and the East Indies, China, Japan, the Philippines and the Far East, New Zealand and Australia, South American ports, the River Plate, Central America, the West Indies, Habana, Cuban ports, Porto Rico, and St. John, New Brunswick; Yarmouth and Halifax, Nova Scotia; and the Canadian Provinces.

Fourteen of these lines are in the coastwise trade to State of Maine ports; New York; Philadelphia; Baltimore; Norfolk; Newport News; Charleston, S. C.; Savannah, Ga.; Jacksonville, Fla.; and two through the Panama Canal to Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Puget Sound ports.

The steamship lines trading to Boston in the foreign trade are the Cunard, Leyland, White Star, Warren, Allan, Wilson, Furness, Red Star, Holland-America, Hamburg-American, North German Lloyd, Scandinavian-American, Russian-American, Sweden-Norway, Austro-American, Spanish-American, Italian, American-Indian, American-Manchurian, American-Oriental, Federal-Shire, Barber, Houston, United Fruit, Habana, Munson, United States Shipping, Porto Rican, International, Yarmouth, and Plant.

In the coastwise trade are the Eastern Steamship Co., the Maine Coast Steamship Co., the Metropolitan, the Merchants & Miners, the Ocean Steamship Co., the Clyde Line, and through the Panama Canal the Boston-Pacific and the American-Hawaiian Lines.

There were at the port of Boston last year 106 boats from Liverpool; 26 from London; 25 from Manchester; 25 from Glasgow; 21 from Hull; 26 from Antwerp; 25 from Rotterdam; 40 from Hamburg; 5 from Bremen (new service); 21 from Copenhagen; 2 from Libau (new service); 18 from the Mediterranean; 73 from Central America; 52 from the West Indies; 13 from Habana; 157 from St. John, New Brunswick; 172 from Yarmouth; 67 from Halifax; 6 from Fowey, England; 17 from South America; 46 from Calcutta and the East Indies; 26 from China, Japan, the Philippines, the Far East, and so forth; in addition to the immense coastwise traffic.

The trans-Atlantic passenger business of the port of Boston last year was 134,315, a gain of 28,652 over 1912 and a gain of 38,053 over 1911.

There were also 1,600 Central American and West Indian passengers, 134,000 Canadian passengers, and about 408,000 coastwise passengers.

These, together with about 22,000,000 excursion passengers, make a total of about 22,677,915 people who used the port of Boston last year.

The port of Boston has 141 miles of linear water front, extending from Point Shirley in Winthrop on the north to Point Allerton in Hull on the south. Forty miles of this 141 is used commercially, of which about 10 miles is located in Boston proper.

The harbor has a water area of 47 square miles (30,000 acres), not including the islands.

The State of Massachusetts in the past 40 years has cooperated with the Federal Government to the extent of $10,787,262.12, of which $5,406,138.79 was spent under the jurisdiction of the State harbor and land commission from 1870 to 1911 and $5,381,123.33 by the directors of the port of Boston from 1911 to date, September 1, 1914.

The port directors have still some $4,000,000 to spend, and trust that the Federal Government will so cooperate in the matter of a 40-foot channel, that it may be invested to the best possible advantage.

The largest dry dock in the world is under course of construction at Boston, 1,200 feet long, 150 feet wide, able to accommodate the largest vessel afloat or projected. There is not a dry dock on the Atlantic coast big enough to take several of the large steamships now coming to this country, and the port of Boston is providing the necessary facilities to accommodate them, and it is the function of the Federal Government to provide the necessary depths of channels to allow these vessels to take advantage of these facilities, both in fairness to the port of Boston for providing them and in fairness to the boats in case of accident.

In the year preceding the adoption of a 40-foot channel project for New York Harbor, 1898, there were in service to that port only 9 steamers drawing 30 feet or over, with a maximum of 32 feet, and the largest vessel in prospect was to draw 33 feet.

At Boston last year 20 vessels drawing 30 feet and over entered or left the port. (Figures from the pilot commissioners of Boston.)

And so, judging from figures, Boston is twice as much entitled to a 40-foot channel now as New York was 15 years ago.

And again, a 40-foot channel authorized now will not be ready for 15 years, at which time it will undoubtedly be small enough.

Since the port directors were established in 1911 the shipping tonnage of the port has increased 5 per cent, the foreign trade of the port over 13 per cent, the trans-Atlantic passenger business over 43 per cent, and the number of steamship lines over 22 per cent.

The port directors have been working for a deeper channel for Boston since December, 1911, almost three years. The project has successfully passed every stage and investigation, until now it is before Congress, and the United States Government should cooperate at the port of Boston by giving Boston a 40-foot channel, the same as New York.

The board of port directors is composed of three of the ablest men in public life in Massachusetts. Its chairman, the Hon. Edward F. McSweeney, has held many public positions, and has recently, at the urgent request of our distinguished governor, the Hon. David I. Walsh, undertaken the work of further developing our harbor facilities. He is a man who does not limit himself to "office hours" when he accepts a commission from our Commonwealth. Day and night, with every ounce of energy and enthusiasm at his control, he is working to make the port of Boston what it should have been years ago. His two valued assistants, the Hon. Joseph A. Conry, a former Member of Congress, and the Hon. Lombard Williams, a former leader in our State senate, are by his side cooperating in every way possible so that the millions which the Commonwealth has appropriated may be expended honestly, wisely, and most advantageously.

As a Representative of Boston and Massachusetts I ask this body to fairly consider our claims. I ask you to cooperate with our people, who have at last awakened to the possibilities before them. Boston and the old Bay State seek no "pork-barrel" gifts, but want your help in a necessary and most urgent undertaking. Give us your aid now. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, while the amendment or substitute adopted by the Senate and recommended by the House committee has been explained to the House, it may be well to recur to it again briefly. It provides a lump appropriation of $20,000,000, to be expended, first, in the preservation of existing projects and also in the prosecution of the projects which have been heretofore adopted by Congress. Some of these projects already adopted are prosecuted directly by the engineers and others by contractors. All new projects carried in the bill as it passed the House are eliminated, and no surveys are carried in the pending amendment. I think there is no difference between the Members upon either side of the House as to their attitude toward this amendment. The objections which have been urged are well founded. It is a bad precedent—bad legislation—and will come up in the future to plague this body in future appropriation bills. So, therefore, I suppose if every friend of the improvement of our waterways would consult his individual judgment about the matter he would vote against the adoption of the amendment passed by the other body. But there is another consideration. If no appropriation is made at this session of Congress, there are many improvements underway the condition of which is so urgent and as to which deterioration will be so great, both as to the equipment and as to the work in progress, as to result in the loss of hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of dollars during the ensuing few months. I might mention one improvement which comes to my mind at the present time, namely, the upper Hudson River. During 1915 the great Barge Canal in New York, with a minimum depth of 12 feet, will have been completed. It can not be operated unless the dam at Troy, undertaken by the Government, is completed contemporaneously, and it is exceedingly important that that work shall have an immediate allotment or appropriation in order that the work of construction may proceed. The same may be said as to the improvement of the upper Hudson, particularly between Albany and the Troy Dam.

So there are other improvements throughout the country which are equally as urgent, and I think it is the duty of every Member of this House who believes in the improvement of waterways as the handmaid of commerce to vote for this bill, if for no other reason than that expressed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], because it is the lesser of two evils.

I deplore some little manifestation to-day of a partisan spirit in the consideration of this bill. I have heard it frequently stated by Members of long service on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and other Members of this House that there has been heretofore nothing partisan in the formulation of river and harbor bills or in their consideration. I know during the time in which I have seen service on the committee that there has never at any time been introduced a partisan or sectional reason for the approval or rejection of any item of improvement, and I hope that this disposition, slight as it may be, that has been manifested to-day may not find lodgment in the minds of the membership of the House.

Mr. Speaker, having made this brief reference to this amendment, I desire to talk briefly on the general subject of our waterways. One gentleman well said that in transportation is involved the prosperity of our country, because upon it rests in part the development and growth of our domestic commerce. It also is important in that it affects our foreign trade. One of the most important economic problems before the American people to-day is the extension of our oversea trade. That extension depends upon the extent to which we put ourselves in a competitive condition with respect to other countries. With cheaper transportation we can cheapen the cost of production, so that both in domestic and foreign trade transportation is the very lifeblood of our commerce. The development of our harbors and our interior waterways ought to impress every Member of the Congress.

In former years the volume of appropriations and the tendency of improvements were largely toward the harbors. Perhaps that was necessary at that time. Perhaps, also, the fact that these harbors were terminals of great trunk lines of railroads may have had influence. But the trend of opinion throughout the entire country for some years has been toward the improvement of our interior waterways, and this bill, as it was formulated and presented to the House by the committee, was, in my opinion, superior to any bill that has heretofore been presented, certainly as good as any during the last few years, in that it recognized in a large way—not overgenerous, but still in a proper way—the necessity of the improvement of these interior waterways. And among these interior waterways not the least important are streams which in themselves may seem insignificant. What may be termed a creek, and yet constituting the only means of transportation for the community which it serves, is just as worthy of an appropriation and being improved as are the larger projects.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. In just one minute. And in the main the appropriations for these small streams affect as large a volume of commerce and, in many instances, larger than those for longer and more important waterways. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. The old-time sailing vessel is rapidly disappearing from the high seas, is it not?

Mr. SMALL. It is.

Mr. MOORE. And the motor boat and the barge have come very extensively into use in inland waters, so that to a very great extent, on a coast line like that of the Atlantic, the inland waterways are useful in carrying trade and commerce in a new form of craft which is rapidly developing?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is entirely right. The trend is along the line of developing barge transportation, improved types of self-propelled barges or exclusive freighters, in order to reduce the cost of transportation to the minimum.

Now, it is not my purpose to discuss any particular project in these remarks, both because it is not necessary in the consideration of this bill and because I wish to discuss in a general way the relation of waterways to our commerce and to our progress. The critics of river and harbor legislation have not always taken the trouble to inform themselves as to the facts or the premises upon which the improvements are demanded or based, and that has been particularly true in respect to some of the periodicals and newspapers of the country. Of course I would not have the temerity or the discourtesy to suggest that any distinguished Member of this House who had criticized river and harbor appropriations was not fully informed. Even if it were so, a Member soon finds that criticisms which are not based upon worthy motives or upon correct statements of fact redound to his discredit more than they injure any proposition before this House.

I agree with some of the critics to this extent, that some of our interior waterways have not developed the volume of commerce which their improvement would justify; and I think that if critics of the improvement of our waterways would devote more of their efforts toward uniting with other friends who seek the promotion of our commerce upon these waterways, they would render a higher service to the country.

I wish to discuss two or three elements which are necessary in the development of commerce upon these waterways. First is the introduction of a better type of carrier. We must study the carriers which are in use on the waterways of continental Europe with reference not only to the cost of operation but also as to the cost of construction, with a view to developing a type of barge or exclusive freighter which in cost of construction and operation shall enable us to reach the minimum of cost in carriage.

Another necessity lies in the provision of terminals at all our harbors and on all our interior waterways. The development of commerce absolutely depends upon the construction of terminals. These ought not to be a burden upon the General Government, but ought to be constructed at the expense of the localities, preferably the States or the municipalities contiguous to the waterways. The terminals are just as necessary to the waterways as they are to railroads, and I am glad to say that our committee two years ago included in the bill which was then passed a provision directing the engineers to investigate the condition of terminals and the absence of terminals at all the ports and cities and landings upon our interior waterways, and that investigation has been completed by the engineers and its results published in a large volume, which contains a fund of information which the student will find most interesting.

These terminals should have ample water fronts and capacious warehouses and facilities for unloading and loading freight with the greatest expedition and at the least cost. They should be constructed and owned by the municipality as a representative of the public, and in addition they should be physically connected by rail with the railroad or railroads serving the community which is contiguous to the waterway. These belt lines of railroad should be owned by the public, and the use of them should be given to the several lines of railroad upon fair terms, yet at such a price as will yield some revenue to the municipality. I believe the time is soon coming when Congress ought to make its appropriations for waterways conditioned upon the public providing or assuming the construction of terminals which shall answer the demands of commerce, because it is not the function of the Federal Government to improve channels unless there shall be developed in those channels a reasonable amount of commerce commensurate with the appropriation.

In addition, the development of our commerce upon our waterways depends upon a system of prorating between water carriers and rail carriers. There was a time in the United States when the tracks of railroads were not standardized, when cars were not standardized, so that there had to be a transfer of freight at the termini of the respective railroads where freight was carried over the lines of more than one road. To-day not only has there been this standardization of track and of cars, but there is a system of prorating between the railroads of the country, so that the shipper at the most remote point in the United States may go to the agent of his railroad and secure a rate of transportation and a through bill of lading to the most distant point in the country, even though in the meantime it should be carried over six or a dozen different lines of railroad. Contending as we do, and as every student admits, that transportation by water is the cheapest method of transportation known, every opportunity should be afforded to shippers to take advantage of the cheap rates by water, and where freight is to be carried partly by water and partly by rail, the shipper is of right entitled to go to the railroad, if the freight must first be shipped upon a line of road, or to the agent of the water carrier if the conditions are reversed, and secure a through rate by the water carrier and the railroad and a through bill of lading to the point of destination. In the Panama Canal act passed in 1912 there was a general provision conferring jurisdiction upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish and enforce such a system of prorating. Owing in part to opposition from the railroads and to indifference or lack of knowledge of the necessity for it upon the part of the water carriers, this system of prorating between water carriers and railroads has not yet had general introduction. But the development of water carriers, the growth of commerce upon our interior waterways, will not secure its full fruition, growth, and development until such a system of prorating is established and maintained between water carriers and rail carriers, in the interest of the man who does the shipping and who pays the freight.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. So, Mr. Speaker, admitting, as we all do, that water transportation is the cheapest method of movement, admitting, as we all do, that the development of water-borne commerce is involved essentially in the progress and prosperity of our country, we must give greater attention in the future to these conditions upon which the development of water-borne commerce depends. One of the grounds of criticism which we frequently hear of projects of river and harbor appropriation is the citation of interior waterways upon which no adequate movement of commerce has developed. It may have been a sufficient answer in the past to have replied that the improvement of such waterways had regulated and reduced freight rates by rail. Valuable as such a result may be—and I do not minimize its value—the time has come when that result alone is not a sufficient justification of appropriations for the deepening of channels or the improvement otherwise of our interior waterways, and we must secure an improved type of carrier, suitable to the respective localities. We must insist that there shall be local cooperation to the extent of providing adequate water terminals, and we must further insist on educating the shipping public, to the end that there shall be prorating, not only as between different lines of water carriers but as between water carriers and railways, so that the shipper may take advantage of the low rate by water and secure the transfer of his freight from the water carrier to the railroad car through the facilities of the water terminal, expeditiously and cheaply; and thus, through these three conditions, make for the development of our water-borne commerce and remove the only justifiable criticism which has been urged against this improvement of our waterways.

I repeat again that if the critics of the appropriations for these improvements will join hands with those who are seeking to promote water-borne commerce and aid in promoting the conditions which will make for the greatest development of transportation by water, they will serve in large degree, and more effectively than they are serving now, the best interests of the people of the entire country. [Applause.]

I yield back any time I may not have used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I have no set speech and no prepared argument upon this Senate amendment. I agree fully with what my friend from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] said a little while ago about the necessity for waterway improvements, but I disagree with him when he says that he will not attempt to talk about the amendment because the amendment has been fully explained. I would like to hear somebody stand up here and explain what the Senate amendment means. I would like to have somebody tell where this money is going to be expended and upon what projects it is going to be expended, and what improvement is intended to be made by it. I do not believe there is anybody in this House who can tell where the money is going. I would like to know something about it before I vote to pass any such measure in this House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, assuming that the gentleman is directing his question to me, I wish to say that, of course, there are no particular projects mentioned in this amendment, but I can easily inform him as to the classes of projects upon which the appropriation will be expended.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The gentleman does not need to do that. I know all about that myself.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I would like to know, then, why the gentleman asked the question?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I know what class of projects this money will be spent upon, and I think the gentlemen at the other end of this building knew very nearly upon what projects the money will be spent when they agreed to pass such an amendment in the Senate, but I know there is nobody who can tell offhand where a dollar of this money is going.

For that reason we of the committee wanted to have the engineers come in and tell us where they were going to spend the money, upon what projects it was necessary to spend the money to maintain them, and upon what projects we should appropriate money to protect them so that the Government would not suffer loss.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Perhaps I can be a little more definite than my suggestion a moment ago indicated. The money will be expended, in so far as it is necessary, in the prosecution of work that can be done between now and the 4th of March next upon adopted projects not heretofore completed, and also upon projects upon which maintenance is necessary.

Mr. GALLAGHER. We ascertained, when we tried to find out yesterday for what projects money would be needed, that it would be necessary to wait for three or four weeks, or possibly six weeks, before the engineers could report anything about it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish to say that the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that; there was no statement made before the committee like that. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GALLAGHER. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is the trouble with the gentleman; I fear he often misunderstands.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Not very often. I understand this amendment, and it is because I think I fully understand it that I am standing up here and kicking against it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. What I said was that the engineers could not at this time tell how much they could expend on any particular project mentioned or referred to in this provision; that they would have to send to the district engineers to get a statement from them, which I said I was informed would require two or three weeks; and they will have to do that, anyway, before they allot much of this money.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I do not care to go into any argument with the chairman of the committee on this proposition, as I think he really feels at heart the same as I do about the whole matter. I propose to make a statement to the Members of the House as to the situation confronting the House. I do not expect to make many converts on that side of the House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Has the gentleman gone over to the other side?

Mr. GALLAGHER. No; but I am going to give my reasons, because there is such a large attendance on our side of the House and so much inattention that I am afraid a large part of what I have to say will not be heard by many Members, and I may be unable to make many converts on that side of the aisle.

I am in favor of waterway improvement, and I was also in favor of the bill reported by the committee. I did not have much to do with the making up of the bill. I was absent a great deal of the time on account of sickness in my family; but I had served long enough with the members of the committee to believe that they were sincere in trying to develop our waterways, improve the streams, and bring increased commerce to our rivers and harbors. I agreed to support the bill as it was passed in this House.

Now, I am not opposed in any way to the bill that the House adopted, and I do not believe that the people are dissatisfied with the bill. I do not believe that there was such an amount of pork as some people would try to make us believe; in fact, I do not believe that there was any pork in the bill whatever. I wish I could say that much for this amendment that is presented here to-day.

Now, the papers in New York had a great deal to say about the pork-barrel measure, and that bill carried a very substantial appropriation for New York Harbor. Some of the Democratic representatives of New York City were here the other day crying out for money to carry on improvements in New York Harbor. Of course there is no pork in the improvements they wanted; the pork must be in some other part of the country. The papers in Philadelphia—and Philadelphia, God knows, has been well taken care of by river and harbor appropriations—the papers of Philadelphia called it a thieves' bill and a grafters' bill, and yet they had a very substantial appropriation for the Delaware River and Philadelphia Harbor.

Mr. DONOHOE. I presume when the gentleman says Philadelphia has been well taken care of he means in recent years.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Oh, yes; the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the job most of the time when improvements are wanted for his city. There was no "pork" in the bill as far as Philadelphia was concerned. The "pork" was somewhere else. The Boston papers termed it a "pork-barrel" bill, and our Democratic colleagues from Boston told us to-day that they needed money for improvement of the Boston Harbor. There was no "pork" in the bill for Boston. It must be for some other place. The papers in Washington, on the Pacific coast, said that there was a lot of "pork" in the bill. Now they find out that they can not get an appropriation for the Columbia River and other projects in that State. Now, there was no "pork" in the bill for Washington; it was some other place. And so it is all over the country.

Now, this bill or this amendment which you propose to act upon this afternoon turns over $20,000,000 to the engineers to parcel out as they see fit, subject to orders of the Secretary of War. I have had enough experience around this Capitol to know that if there is any influence to be exercised upon the Secretary of War or upon any of the heads of the great departments, the very potent influence does not come from Members of this body. It will probably be exercised by gentlemen at the other end of the building; and they must know, or there must have been some understanding about this matter, when they could agree, after all of the abuse that was heaped upon the river and harbor bill over there—they must have known, or do know, or have some understanding, where this $20,000,000 is going to be spent.

I am not going to vote and allow them to carry out anything other than what I think is right, believing it is our duty to know where the money shall be spent and for what purpose it shall be spent. I do not propose to abrogate any right that I have or to allow myself to be convinced that the people over on the Senate side know any more about where money should be spent or is needed than I do. We sent the bill there early in the spring and the bill lay over there nearly all summer.

Then they took it up, and in a quarrel among themselves abused the bill and everything in it, and finally decided that the best way to settle the matter would be to make a lump appropriation and let the Secretary of War parcel it out. If you want to do that, go ahead and vote for this bill. I do not. If you are satisfied that that is the way to spend the money of the people, go ahead and spend it; but I do not believe, in the face of the arguments that have been made in this House over the war-tax measure and on account of the condition of the Treasury, due to the falling off of revenues, and of having passed a bill to tax the people for $105,000,000, that we ought to go to work and squander $20,000,000 or vote $20,000,000 of the people's money for intended improvements upon rivers and harbors when we really do not know for what projects it is intended to spend the money. I am against the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, six months ago a river and harbor bill passed the House carrying over $43,000,000. The bill further authorized new projects which, apart from cash included in the 1914 appropriation, created an additional obligation of over $32,000,000, or a total of more than $76,000,000. The bill was opposed in the House, but not enough votes could be secured against it to secure a single roll call. All proposed amendments were voted down, although facts were presented to the House based on Army engineers' reports that disclosed the wasteful character of a large number of the projects.

Thereafter the sundry civil bill was passed and became a law, carrying $6,990,000 in various river and harbor projects.

The regular bill of $43,289,004 cash was taken up by the Senate committee, and several of the vicious projects contained in the bill were stricken out by that committee, including Mattawan Creek, the Kissimmee and Oklawaha Rivers. In all, it was an eventual saving in expenditures of nearly a million dollars. However, the Senate committee, after making such deductions, proceeded to add over $10,000,000 to the bill, so when reported to the Senate it carried over $53,000,000, which, together with over $32,000,000 in new projects and appropriations carried by the sundry civil bill, reached, in all, over $93,000,000 for rivers and harbors in 1914. The history of the bill's stormy road in the Senate is recent history. It was finally defeated, and the substitute amendment, drawn by Senator BURTON and introduced by Senator BANKHEAD, was passed at $20,000,000 in a lump sum, to be apportioned among the different localities as was deemed advisable under the authority of the Secretary of War and Board of Engineers.

AMOUNT NOW AVAILABLE FOR WATERWAYS.

From the report of the Secretary of War, in response to a Senate resolution, it appears that on June 30, 1914, there was an unexpended balance from previous appropriations for rivers and harbors of $45,338,653. Just what portion of this can be expended on existing projects is in dispute; but whatever the amount may be, it is in addition to the $6,990,000 already appropriated by the sundry civil bill and the $20,000,000 carried by the Senate substitute, now before the House.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has offered an amendment of $5,000,000 to the Senate substitute. The question under discussion is, Shall the amendment reducing the substitute to $5,000,000 be agreed to?

By passing the substitute the Senate bill, which in present and future expenditures begun this year amounted to about $86,000,000, will be cut $66,000,000; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Washington is accepted, it will be a further saving of $15,000,000, or a total reduction of $81,000,000 in the Senate bill as reported to that body.

From all we can learn, $5,000,000, in addition to the $6,990,000 carried by the sundry civil bill and balance available from the $45,000,000 of unexpended appropriations, will continue work on necessary projects, particularly at a time when a $100,000,000 war tax in time of peace is being levied to care for extravagant expenditures for other purposes.

For this reason I favor the amendment, and hope it will pass.

DECEPTIVE TONNAGE STATISTICS.

A few words additional may properly be said at this time, because the temporary defeat of the overloaded river and harbor bill will not be a permanent saving unless future appropriations are kept within reasonable limits. It has been the practice of waterway enthusiasts who seek to secure favor for any particular project or for the whole bill to speak of the tonnage carried on the particular river, harbor, or creek and to thereby try and justify Government expenditures.

Such efforts have been undertaken in the present discussion. A fact is offered for your consideration on this point which I can only briefly suggest without attempting to discuss.

Whenever a bill is presented we are given tonnages from all ports of the country, whether subject to recent improvements or not, and the tonnage of the ocean and lake ports is used to swell a rapidly diminishing river traffic.

A brief examination of the subject will disclose the facts. Again, river traffic is subject to many peculiar conditions that frequently discredit the deductions of Army engineers who approve commercial possibilities of projects. Only through an analysis of traffic can a fairly clear understanding be reached of its character and value.

From the best obtainable Government data we find—for instance, on the Ohio River, which carries the largest river traffic—a loss occurred of 34 per cent in seven years. Ninety per cent of all the traffic goes by open river, unaffected by the present $63,000,000 canalization project. Four-fifths of the 10 per cent passing through locks is coal or low-grade freight, leaving approximately 2 per cent high-grade freight accommodated by the canal locks.

DUPLICATIONS OF FREIGHT.

On different projects connected with the Ohio River system lockage traffic is of uncertain value, because the freight on the same boat is frequently recounted at different locks, and yet waterway orators all over the country persist in ignoring these patent facts when they are after Government appropriations.

On the upper Mississippi I have brought to the attention of the House in other remarks that receipts and shipments of the same identical freight at a river town are added together. On the Missouri River I presented tables in the April 10 RECORD, page 7076, showing that even under the loose methods of duplication only 34,334 tons, or 15 per cent of the total traffic, could possibly be included as important freight. Sand, wood, logs, and revetment material compose over 90 per cent of such traffic.

Logs that would better float without canal locks than with compose 90 per cent of the traffic on some of the North Carolina and other southern streams that want Government money. Other illogical or misleading statistics are used to bolster up wasteful projects, but I do not intend to discuss such general phases of the subject, although they have formed strong ground for argument during recent debates on the river and harbor bill at both ends of the Capitol. I realize, and every other Member must have discovered, that actual merit is of little consideration in determining whether or not a waterway is to be improved. It may figure in public consideration or in enthusiastic waterway conventions held throughout the country, but it is not the controlling factor.

CRITICISMS OF ARMY ENGINEERS.

I have been charged with undue criticism of Army engineers, and it has been suggested that Gen. Goethals is an Army engineer and his accomplishments render all others immune from criticism. To couple the name of Goethals with that of other officials who have burdened this country with hundreds of wasteful waterway projects on which millions of dollars are being spent, is to dodge behind Goethal's coat tails. Read, if you will, the criticisms of Senators BURTON, KENYON, and GALLINGER of different projects having approval of Army engineers, and find a verification of the same conclusions drawn from the same reports when the bill was before the House. A careful study of these reports will bring the same deductions from any unprejudiced jury that could be placed in possession of the facts.

Army engineers are human and subject to human weaknesses. If this be treason, then I will quote some of their foremost champions in corroboration of my statement.

That Congress does not trust the judgment of Army engineers is evidenced by statements of some of the ablest men on the Rivers and Harbors Committee presented in the RECORD for Tuesday, September 29.

In his address in this debate, Chairman SPARKMAN stated, in substance, that he did not care to abrogate the right of Congress to determine where public moneys are to be expended and turn it over to Army engineers. Nothing but dire necessity compelled him to support that proposition.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, the able leader of the minority of the committee, said:

I am opposed to the Senate amendment for the reason, among others, that it takes away from Congress the power of saying where this money shall be expended and places it entirely in the control of the Government engineers. * * * They propose to take the $20,000,000 and place it in a lump sum and then place it where the man that can bring the most influence on the engineers will get the most money. I say that it is unjust and is unfair to those engineers who, to a certain extent, hold their positions by favor of Congress. * * * This $20,000,000 is not sufficient to take care of half of the propositions in this country, and placing upon the engineers the responsibilities under political pressure that will come in deciding as to where that money shall be expended is unjust and dangerous.

The gentleman from Washington stated a self-evident truth.

THE SAME INFLUENCE IS BEHIND PROPOSED PROJECTS.

A similar situation was presented when the chairman first reported the bill to the House, with a statement that many projects had been passed by Army engineers that could not be undertaken at this time, and, further, that numerous new surveys were being considered by Army engineers.

He did not then say, which is also a reasonable conclusion, that in every instance "there is placed upon engineers the responsibilities under political pressure that will come in deciding" as to what projects shall be passed and what rejected, and what policy "is unjust and dangerous."

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] has said in this debate:

I agree with him [Mr. HUMPHREY] that I would much prefer that Congress should control the allotments of this money rather than that it should be done by the Secretary of War and the Government engineers.

Another able member of the committee, Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, has given utterance in the same debate to these remarks:

Now, what will happen in case this amendment is agreed to and the bill becomes a law in its present form? The Engineer's Office will be overwhelmed by requests from Members of Congress and organizations in localities that are interested * * * and sufficient pressure will be brought to bear in some cases to allot sums to projects where it is not most urgently needed in the interests of navigation.

Does not the argument apply with equal force where proposed projects are being considered by the Army engineers? If you doubt the fact, read the Engineer's report where honest, capable, underofficers are overruled when political influence is exercised on their superiors.

In the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] regarding this $20,000,000 Senate substitute, appears this trite observation:

More than that, it specifies the Corps of Engineers have exclusive jurisdiction over a lump sum, and thus subjects it to all the embarrassments that result from logrolling and political influence, which, perhaps, are just as vicious in their way as is what is commonly called the "pork barrel."

This statement can not be successfully disputed by any Member on the floor, and the gentleman is right, beyond question.

THE ARMY ENGINEER HAS ENTIRE CONTROL.

That the Engineer's office will be besieged by a throng of Senators and Representatives from morning to night is probable. That the Chief of Engineers, who has been so frequently lauded by the advocates of the present system, will be hounded to death and wish he could delegate the job elsewhere is equally true. For years we have made him the sole arbiter on all projects, with power to allow and disallow, subject to no appeal. For years troops of Senators and Congressmen have traveled, hat in hand, up to the Engineer's sanctum, and after waiting patiently their turn have one and all pressed upon this distinguished official the interests of their several constituents. His powers of resistance are measured by human endurance, so that constant dropping day by day has worn out opposition. The Oklawaha, Kissimmee, Scuppernong, Trinity, and countless other questionable projects are approved. When once allowed it becomes a scramble for the Treasury. That is the beautiful system we have adopted.

In proof of my statement I make the prediction that practically every worthless project exposed by Senators GALLINGER, KENYON, and others in the list of North Carolina creeks will be taken care of by a watchful engineer's department. The Hudson River important project to connect the Great Lakes with the ocean canal through New York State will be relegated presumably with unimportant projects to a "back seat." If so, it will be added proof of the statement by defenders of the engineers that political pressure and not merit is to determine the distribution of funds just as such pressure has determined the allowance of many worthless projects.

IS CRITICISM INVITED BY PRESENT METHODS?

Criticism has been heard upon this floor of those who declare the river and harbor bill to be a "pork barrel." Members have denounced the press for so stating. Gentlemen at both ends of the Capitol have grown red in the face and demanded proof that this is a "pork barrel." Listening with ears that will not hear, looking with eyes that will not see, such gentlemen profess to know nothing about a pork barrel. No one is deceived. No one is fooled. The press of the country has mercilessly dissected the bill and the specious arguments offered in its defense. From all parts of the country has come denunciation of the worst pork barrel ever offered to Congress. The press generally reflects public sentiment. Occasionally a paper represents some special interest, but as a rule news editors are as able, fearless, and as well informed as Members on this floor.

During the last 60 days the press has made possible the successful fight waged against the "pork barrel." It has forced an administration to back down over the infamous bill. That service may have been influenced in some instances by the startling fact that a direct war tax is about to be passed to cover a "pork barrel," but the Treasury ought ever to be protected against what Senator TILLMAN once termed a "humbug and a steal," and all honor to the American press that helped win the battle.

WHAT IS A "PORK BARREL"?

No Member on this floor receives any direct benefit from a pork barrel. Why does an entire Congress determine where a public building or a river and harbor project should be located? One of my first acts performed in a legislative capacity was to introduce two bills for public buildings for cities that furnished the requisite postal receipts. I learned the department did not determine the matter. Congress had to act, and any proposed appropriations, I was informed, would be cut in half. Only two public buildings have been erected in that district in the 74 years of statehood we have enjoyed. One other has been authorized. Possibly these are all that will be allowed for some time, but if my vote to secure a public building for my district involves voting for a corrupt pork barrel I will not stultify myself by supporting for my own people what I denounce in others.

I believe public buildings are of permanent good to local communities, but the interests of Government business should be paramount in determining where such buildings are to be located, and the present system of pork-barrel distribution prevents the consideration by comparative merit. It ought not to depend upon political pull. No man defends the system, and a better businesslike plan should be substituted that will better serve public interests. I refer to public buildings, because two Members of the House assailed my sincerity of purpose by mentioning these bills. I have nothing to conceal nor to defend. If these buildings are worthy projects, they should be built, but with only two public buildings in the district no one will accuse my predecessors of having much influence with any pork barrel in the 74 years the district has been represented in this House.

PUBLIC SERVICE, NOT PERSONAL MOTIVES, AT ISSUE.

Independent of my own purposes, the question is not whether I have any interest in rivers and harbors or public buildings. The real question is whether or not a pork barrel exists, and, if so, what should be substituted. I do not assume at this time to say what is the best substitute. Until we become disgusted with pork-barrel methods, until public sentiment forces Congress to change the system, it is idle to propose a change. Possibly I am over sanguine in believing that Congress will some day reject the present system. It is firmly intrenched, but no cause is hopeless if it is right, and every man who has a good, meritorious waterway project should be ready to submit his case to an unprejudiced body for its determination.

HOW IS THE PORK BARREL MADE?

Anyone who imagines the river and harbor bill is not a pork barrel for constituencies can be quickly disillusioned by presenting a river and harbor improvement separately to the House or Senate. No one project could be pushed through Congress even though it was subject to introduction as a separate claim or bill. No 10 or 20 river and harbor projects could be engineered through Congress, however meritorious they might be. I do not believe I am misrepresenting the case when I say that no 100 projects, however meritorious individually, could be passed in one bill through Congress.

THE BILL'S SUPPORT.

Let us face the facts squarely. The present bill includes some 350 projects. Nearly a hundred additional projects approved by the engineers are on "the waiting list." Hundreds of others are hoping to be advanced in their turn to "the waiting list." Hundreds of other projects are on the maintenance list. Hardly a single Member is not importuned on some project, and this makes up the vote that carries the bill through Congress. Good, bad, and indifferent projects are in the bill. All must be considered. New York Harbor gets in, providing the Scuppernong is remembered. Chicago and other lake ports are included after the lower Mississippi is assured of the lion's share. Boston is placed in the bill when the notorious Trinity gets its place at the pie counter. The river men in the interior insist that improvements at Philadelphia and elsewhere are for the benefit of railways that own or control the terminals, and Philadelphia points to the dwindling Mississippi River commerce, reduced over 80 per cent in 15 years, and declares that the Mississippi River is a land reclamation proposition.

North Carolina, with influential Members at both ends of the Capitol, gets 28 projects, while Florida, equally well represented, runs over a score.

Is it the best we can do? Can any man defend such a scandalous system? How can anyone blame every newspaper in the land for labeling this bill a "pork barrel." To say it is half "pork" or one-half of 1 per cent "pork" does not mean anything definite. If the Philadelphia and Delaware River project, reaching approximately $21,000,000, is for the benefit of railway terminals, as claimed by Louisiana, then it will generally be regarded as a "pork" proposition for the Government to finance such special-interest projects. The same is true of Bridgeport, Providence, and many other ports mentioned in the report of the Commissioner of Commerce. If the Mississippi River, with its proposed $9,000,000 in 1914 below St. Louis, is a vast reclamation scheme, as many authorities declare, it, too, is "pork." If the Ohio River $63,000,000 project is of doubtful value and is undertaken simply to keep contractors and employers busy, it is a questionable investment, particularly when river traffic has fallen off 34 per cent within the last seven years and only a small fraction of river freight goes through the locks.

LARGE AND SMALL GRABS.

These are large projects. Some of them may be of value, but others are questionable, and doubts arise from Government reports as to their character. I have not discussed the intercoastal canal. North Carolina's officials, from Cabinet members to humble Representatives, are ready to fight for the Beaufort $5,400,000 canal, although it is of no more use as a naval asset than a fifth wheel to a wagon, in the opinion of other disinterested authorities. The Delaware & Chesapeake Canal, whether it is $8,000,000 or $20,000,000, is another link that connects the railway terminals of Philadelphia with the railway terminals of Baltimore, although no railway nor municipality contributes toward this promising bankrupt canal project.

And so it runs, from the Murderkill to the Newbegun, and from Raccoon Creek to the Trinity, and over on the Red and on the Ouachita, that was to receive $327,500 in the amended substitute bill offered in the Senate. Measured by standards of actual commerce and permanent benefit to navigation, some of these projects are generally conceded to be "pork"—possibly not by those who are urging their passage, for even the water-power interests on the Coosa and Black Warrior are indignant and resent the term, and so do interests along the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers.

Many of these projects have been analyzed and condemned by the greatest waterway expert in the country, and Senator BURTON'S judgment will not be rejected by the average unprejudiced mind. It does not answer to insinuate that this distinguished statesman has passed other bad bills in other years, resting his protest with the committee.

A HISTORIC FIGHT AGAINST GRAB.

The country knows that Senator BURTON has performed a great public service in exposing the 1914 pork-barrel items and a greater service in defeating an infamous proposition that presumably would not have received a half dozen votes in either House had the projects been voted upon separately.

Every consideration of personal comfort and legislative ease called for tacit consent or silence on his part. The Ohio Senator gave to the country a splendid exhibition of courage, matched by phenomenal physical endurance, that will never be forgotten by those who write the true history of river and harbor legislation.

I have been accused of self-seeking and other offenses, when the big fact remains that the 1914 river and harbor bill, first challenged in the House, was riddled and perforated from beginning to end through the wonderful knowledge of his subject possessed by Senator BURTON.

Many of the wasteful projects exposed in the House were criticized with equal severity by Senators GALLINGER and KENYON, both of whom came to the same conclusions, based upon a careful study of the Engineers' reports. These Senators and those who aided them in giving to the country a true understanding of the infamous bill, are entitled to everlasting credit for the bill's defeat.

PERSONALITIES VERSUS ARGUMENT.

For prejudiced, narrow-visioned critics to engage in personalities because of the pork barrel defeat only indicates an absolute lack of fairness possessed by Members who are either ignorant of the provisions of the bill or bitter toward those who oppose their wasteful projects.

In his sweeping statements in the House, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] honors me with consideration because of my humble efforts to defeat the "pork barrel." The country that has read a telling analysis of extravagant and wasteful Tennessee and Cumberland River projects, as presented by the great waterway expert, Senator BURTON, will not search for a reason. A countercharge that the press of the country enjoys a great graft, which should be investigated, is not creditable to the courage or moral standards of any consenting Member who comes to such conclusions. Much can be said on both sides of that question, but the fact that a speech defending a pork barrel can be sent broadcast throughout the country free, under a Congressman's frank, may also raise an interesting question affecting governmental mail expenditures.

The 1914 pork barrel would not have been defeated but for the splendid fight made by the independent press against it. As an educational medium, it helped keep $66,000,000 in the Federal Treasury by that defeat. This, in itself, is a highly creditable act, which can not in any degree be placed at the door of the gentleman from Tennessee.

WHY NOT HIT THE SENATE COMMITTEE?

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of replying to the half-hour tirade indulged in by the irascible gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and his understudy, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. The gentleman from Florida was indignant because the Kissimmee River ($47,000) and the Oklawaha ($733,000) projects were criticized by me on March 26, when discussing river items in the House. Two facts are significant. First, that it took a Rip Van Winkle sleep of over six months for indignation to sink deep into the mind of the Florida champion before he found time and place for expression. The second and most important factor is that when the Senate committee reported the Senate bill, although it raised the total over $10,000,000, that committee, with commendable wisdom, struck out the Kissimmee Creek, unnavigable, but not dry, eight months in the year, and the crooked Oklawaha, together with other projects which I exposed in the House. The Senate committee could not swallow such vicious projects, and when no chance for squeezing them through in conference dawned upon the Florida statesman, who honored me with his criticism, then and not until then did the full extent of my offending, six months before, appear.

It is toward the Senate committee, and not myself, that the popguns of the gentleman from Florida should have been aimed.

A STUDY IN GLASS HOUSES.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] seems to be subject to an aggravated case of forgetfulness and Quixotic pork-barrel championship.

In other legislative bodies where parliamentary courtesy is observed in debate I have learned that abuse harms only those who indulge in it. Abuse is not argument, and never was the fact more plainly demonstrated than by the unfortunate position into which the gentleman from Mississippi so easily tumbled.

Even the courteous gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who was originally opposed to me on the river and harbor bill, felt called upon to express indignation, when he said:

I do not believe it is very becoming of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to devote four-fifths of his speech to criticizing the Member of the House [Mr. FREAR] who may have been more responsible than any other man for inviting public opinion and fixing public thought on these extravagances.

Mr. Speaker, these are generous words, whether deserved or not, coming as they do from a gentleman who recognizes that vituperation has no proper place in this House.

I will not reply to misrepresentation indulged in by the gentleman from Mississippi concerning "pork" for my district, because I introduced several pension bills for men who gave the best years of their lives trying to keep Mississippi in the Union, men who are now aged invalids. The attack of the Mississippi Member was preceded by a pronounced statement that he would be unworthy of the commission he held if he should refuse to vote for a just pension bill. The Republican leader of the House, who commands the respect and admiration of the entire country, saved me from the necessity of a reply. Somewhere in the remarkable brain of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] there reposes a cell that years before located and tabulated records which determined the truth or untruth of expressions of loyalty to veterans.

After the Mississippi Member finished his carefully prepared verbal assault, the distinguished Republican leader of the House rose and in the course of his remarks said:

I think it is a mistake in the House where some gentleman makes a fight, believing that he is right, that other Members of the House should indulge in personal criticism, if not abuse. [Applause on the Republican side.] I was much surprised that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], for whom I have alway entertained a high regard, descended so far in debate, as it seems he did, endeavoring to give a roast to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who, I think, is entitled to the thanks of the country for what he has done, whether he be right or wrong. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The applause is not mentioned to give color to the voluntary defense offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but to show the silence of Democratic Members who a day or so before had passed a $100,000,000 war-tax bill under a gag rule, but were not pleased to save $33,000,000 to the country through an emasculated river and harbor bill.

THE RECORD SPEAKS FOR ITSELF.

Continuing his remarks, the gentleman from Illinois, while gently fingering several RECORDS before the watchful eyes of the professed lover of war veterans, said:

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], addressing the House with considerable fervor, said:

"You call this a 'pork-barrel' bill. It is no more a 'pork-barrel' bill than the pension bills. I have always voted for pension bills, coming from the South as I do."

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. What for?

Mr. HARRISON. I know the gentleman does not want to misrepresent me, but I did not say that I always voted for pension bills. I said I believed in a reasonable pension for those who deserve it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said in effect that he always voted for the pension bills. If he does not make any change in his remarks, the RECORD will justify what I say. It excited my attention and recalled to my memory the fact that the gentleman was slightly in error, in my judgment, and I sent for the RECORD. We have had several roll calls on pension bills, both on private pension bills and on the general appropriation bills during the last Congress. The gentleman said, in effect: "Look at me. I favor pension bills to be paid to the northern soldiers, but you are now opposing a river and harbor bill to be expended in the South," and he criticized the gentlemen who were opposing the Senate amendment in this respect. And I find that on March 21, 1912, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] moved to suspend the rules and pass a private omnibus pension bill, which was passed by a vote of 193 yeas to 34 nays, the name of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], while it did not lead all the rest, is to be found conspicuously among those voting nay; and that on February 18, 1913, when the vote was taken again on the passage of an omnibus private pension bill, and the yeas and nays were ordered at the demand of Mr. Roddenbery, when the yeas were 219 and the nays were 40, again the name of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who favors pension legislation and pension bills, is found recorded among those voting "nay." And on March 9, 1912, when we had before us the annual appropriation bill making appropriations to pay those pensions which had already been allowed under the law, on a point of no quorum being made, and the yeas and nays being ordered, the yeas on the passage of the bill being 214 and the nays 38, I find that again the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, so ardently in favor of pension bills and pension appropriation bills, has his name recorded as voting "nay."

I should not have referred to this except for the holier-than-thou attitude which the gentleman from Mississippi assumed while criticizing the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. It is a pretty good thing when you live in a glass house not to throw stones.

THE GENTLEMAN FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. Speaker, may I digress for a moment to say that one of the best things which has come before the American public this year is "The Gentleman from Mississippi." Good, moral lessons are not taught from the pulpit alone nor by the world's greatest writers. Other messages of human interest, that leave distinct impressions, are often pictured upon the stage.

In the play of that name "the Gentleman from Mississippi" is Senator Langdon, who energetically denounces in the United States Senate a proposed land grab in his own State. His arrival in Washington is featured upon meeting a Union veteran, whose pension he undertakes to secure. While generously placing a roll of bills in the northerner's hands with which to send him home, the gentleman from Mississippi and the northern veteran recall the days when they gallantly fought on opposite sides of the same intrenchments.

Langdon afterwards exposes the "Altacoola" land purchase by the Government of lands in Mississippi and defeats the bill, although it concerned his own State.

"The Gentleman from Mississippi" is a fine type of manliness; a true American, whose sense of honor and justice could not be influenced by personal interests, local considerations, or lobbyists.

"Hamlet" is a wonderful and weird study of human conduct that interests and fascinates the scholar in search of motives, but "The Gentleman from Mississippi," unknown to fame, is a wholesome sermon that appeals to the best impulses of every man.

PROJECTS I HAVE CRITICIZED IN THE HOUSE.

May I offer a further reply of a personal character? Upon this floor, with all my energies, I opposed the $9,000,000 appropriation for the lower Mississippi River land-reclamation scheme, which is part of an unlimited expenditure; also, a $2,000,000 appropriation for the wasteful Missouri River project, part of an estimated $20,000,000 wasteful scheme; also, a $5,000,000 appropriation for the canalization of the Ohio River, part of a $63,000,000 project; and also a $2,250,000 appropriation for a bankrupt canal project, part of an eventual $20,000,000 scheme. The RECORD will bear out my statement. I have also introduced several resolutions showing the insiduous character of the worst lobby ever organized in this country in favor of any bill, a lobby which annually pushes on the pork barrel. The resolutions were promptly smothered or ignored by the committee. The Mississippi Member, in a personal attack, complains because I only presented a score of amendments against the pork barrel, all of which were promptly voted down by a House that refused a roll call; also, because I persisted in offering resolutions of inquiry.

Further amendments were useless where responsibility could not be fixed by roll calls. It was an equal waste of effort in making demands upon the Rivers and Harbors Committee for a report upon my resolutions. Only a simpleton would have wasted time on either proposition. Surely only a simpleton could expect it, and I assume there are no simpletons here.

The reversal of the House's action on the pork-barrel bill is an answer to abuse, and a score of letters of commendation from those engaged in the fight show the resolutions served a purpose, if not all that was desired. I appealed from the House action to a higher forum in the case of the pork barrel, and I appeal to a higher forum than any committee when I insert in these remarks a portion of the evidence I have to sustain allegations contained in the resolutions.

HUMBLE EFFORTS ARE APPRECIATED.

Mr. Speaker, by our acts we shall be known. I do not expect to measure up to my own ideals while a Member of this House. I expect to make mistakes, and shall ever be glad to receive fair criticism, but insincere accusations are of no value.

I can not find words of appreciation for the remark of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois that I am in any degree entitled to the thanks of the country for my work against the $53,000,000 pork barrel. The generous expression of the gentleman from Massachusetts that I, more than any other one man, may have been responsible in uniting public opinion and fixing public thought on river and harbor extravagances, is also appreciated. May I be pardoned for here inserting other kindly words, which come unsolicited from a distinguished Senator who perfected an organization and rendered eloquent service to the country with Senator BURTON when the $53,000,000 vicious pork barrel was defeated.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
September 23, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FREAR: Now that the river and harbor bill is defeated, I can not refrain from giving credit where credit is due. You are the man who started the whole fight; you are the man who is entitled to the credit. You, in my judgment, performed one of the greatest public services that any man has ever done in Congress. I congratulate you from the bottom of my heart.

If you need me in your campaign, I will be glad to come there and tell the people what a splendid Representative you have been. Would that we had more men in Congress like you.

Sincerely, yours, W. S. KENYON.

A brief word received from the distinguished man who made the great victory possible is also inserted:

HOT SPRINGS, VA., October 1, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FREAR: I learn that the House concurred night before last in the Senate substitute after a lively debate.

I am here for a brief rest, but can not omit to congratulate you on your part in this most happy outcome. I am sure that you will be listened to more attentively next winter than you were last winter or spring.

Yours, sincerely, T. E. BURTON.

Words of commendation quoted from Members of the House and Senate, with many others from leading journals of the country, I place in the scales against the record of the gentleman from Mississippi, which was read to the House by the gentleman from Illinois.

To show that legitimate transportation companies are not misled as to the real issue, a brief extract is offered from a lengthy resolution passed at its annual meeting in 1914 by the leading commercial body of the country, the New York Board of Trade and Transportation:

Whereas through the efforts mainly of Congressman JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, and Senator THEODORE E. BURTON, of Ohio, the 1914 rivers and harbors bill as reported by the Senate Commerce Committee has been defeated—

* * * * * * *

Resolved, That while we regret the defeat of certain items in the rivers and harbors bill * * * we nevertheless regard with approval the defeat of the bill as a whole, and commend Congressman JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, and Senator THEODORE E. BURTON, of Ohio, for their courage and perseverance in opposing the inflated rivers and harbors bill and cordially congratulate them upon the success of their efforts.

It is needless to say I had no intention of dragging my own personality into this controversy, but from many kind words received throughout the country I am content to leave my record to the judgment of those who are disinterested and unprejudiced.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER PROJECT.

Mr. Speaker, I have made an investigation in a small way of the Mississippi River land-reclamation scheme. Under the 1914 river and harbor bill which passed the House the Mississippi River below St. Louis received the enormous amount of $8,000,000, whereas the river above St. Louis, of about equal length and carrying equal tonnage, received only $1,500,000. When the bill was reported to the Senate it carried $9,000,000 below St. Louis and $1,500,000 above that city to St. Paul. In other words, for every dollar spent on the northern half of the river six dollars were given to the southern half. And it must not be forgotten that traffic upon the lower Mississippi has decreased over 80 per cent within the last 20 years, according to Government reports.

This is the bill carrying $9,000,000 for the lower Mississippi River that I am charged—I trust correctly—with having helped to defeat.

Just how much of the $20,000,000 will be spent by Army engineers on the Mississippi remains to be seen.

THE PORK BARREL IS NOW A KEG.

The substitute amendment carries $20,000,000, or less than two-fifths of the $53,000,000 contained in the original pork barrel. If other projects receive an equal proportion of the new "pork keg," then the Mississippi, instead of receiving $9,000,000 below St. Louis, will be given approximately two-fifths of $9,000,000, or about $3,600,000. This will be a saving to the country of $5,400,000 that ought not to be squeezed out of our people in unjust and unnecessary war taxes. For this result I am held, in part, responsible by the gentleman from Mississippi, and it is not unreasonable to presume that his indignation in part is predicated upon that loss to the lower Mississippi and proportionate saving to the Government. Is it a "pork" proposition to throw millions of dollars annually into the Mississippi River? I recognize the cry for flood protection that has been raised by people of the lower Mississippi River Valley, and I believe I am as much in sympathy with that cry as other Members on this floor. But I am firmly convinced that nearly all of the money now poured into the lower Mississippi is being wasted; that we have been hypnotized by the voice of the experimenting Army engineer, on the one hand, and have been influenced by a hope that we are helping to prevent floods, on the other.

I firmly believe the present Mississippi River reclamation system is a monstrous waste of money, and that the country will awake to the true state of facts within a short space of time. I further believe that much of the agitation behind the present Mississippi levee improvements is caused by reclamation interests which desire to reclaim private lands at Government expense. Thus far in the discussion of the waterways of the country I have tried to furnish credible testimony on every point to sustain my belief. If I fail to do so in this case, I know it will invite ridicule, but I am not concerned, because ridicule encountered when we began the fight against the river and harbor bill determined nothing. Results count.

Let me say, in passing, it would be ungenerous to accept credit or all blame for that fight when we remember the excellent aid given to the same movement by the able gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY]. He was called away to defend his record before his constituents, a splendid record, far better in service to his State and country than the record of those who tried to save the Trinity River project. After his departure I tried to keep alive interest in the matter. I claim no credit for performing a public duty.

THE MISSISSIPPI HAS SWALLOWED A VAST SUM.

Mr. Speaker, the Mississippi River has received between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000 from Government and local contributions, most of which has gone into the river south of St. Louis. Army engineers have indorsed all manner of worthless schemes. Politics, personal interest, and a variety of causes are assigned for incompetence. In the case of the Mississippi River wholesale criticism arises, in my judgment, from a combination of unfortunate influences. If political pressure will affect the distribution of the $20,000,000 pork barrel, as has been stated on the floor of the House by champions of the Army engineers' system, then what must be expected where the owners of lands and other interests to be affected bring pressure for the same purpose against the same officers?

At this point I desire to introduce a resolution into the RECORD concerning the Mississippi River, which is now awaiting action from the Rivers and Harbors Committee:

[H. Con. Res. 50. Sixty-third Congress, second session. In the House of Representatives. September 21, 1914. Mr. FREAR submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.]

Whereas about $200,000,000 have been expended in attempt to control the Mississippi River below Cairo, principally by the use of levees and revetments, which as a means for that purpose are deemed by many to be impracticable and futile; and

Whereas by the present rivers and harbors bill further great sums of money are proposed to be appropriated to continue this questionable attempt by the same means: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That no appropriation made by the present rivers and harbors bill shall be available for use upon the Mississippi River below Cairo until the feasibility and advisability of plans which depend upon levees and revetments for control of the Mississippi River below Cairo have been approved, or other plans substituted by an advisory board of consulting engineers, in accordance with the provisions of H. R. 18169, now before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Resolved further, That the members of such advisory board of consulting engineers, appointed by the President in conformity with the provisions of said bill, shall require to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible in a few remarks to present more than an outline of the weakness and wastefulness of the present Mississippi River system. The flood of the early eighties, followed by the flood of 1903 and the recent floods of 1912 and 1913, do not faze the Mississippi River Commission nor the Army engineers who are superintending the project. Washed-out levees and flooded districts are viewed with equanimity as long as the Treasury holds out. Political conventions of all parties are persuaded to adopt resolutions with promises of aid, and Presidents are importuned to exercise their influence in retaining present officials and keeping up the present wasteful system.

A BILLION-DOLLAR LAND PROJECT.

Nor is the reclamation of lands overlooked when it is estimated that 20,000,000 acres in the Deltas can be protected by a system of levees. Of this amount 80 per cent is estimated to be now valueless, but when the land is reclaimed the increase in value will be phenomenal.

Prior to the floods of 1880, before these levees had been tested and their inadequacy ascertained, the opinions of Presidents and of Congresses were clearly set forth in frequent utterances, one of much significance being a provision in the 1881 rivers and harbors bill, which expressly provided that no portion of the sum thereby appropriated should be used in the repair or construction of levees for the purpose of preventing injury to lands by overflow or for any other purpose whatever, except as a means of deepening or improving the channel of said river.

It is significant that the river and harbor bill of 1881, which covered every river and harbor in the country from Maine to California, reached a total expenditure of $8,951,500, whereas the amounts carried by the river and harbor bill for this year on the Mississippi alone reached $10,500,000, and of this amount $9,000,000 was for the lower Mississippi, south of St. Louis. More money was carried for the lower Mississippi River in the 1914 bill than for all the rivers and harbors of the country in 1881, and yet remember, according to Government reports, the traffic on the lower Mississippi has decreased over 80 per cent since 1881.

The total amount carried by the sundry civil bill and river and harbor bill for 1914 was about seven and one-half times the amount carried in 1881. River traffic decreased on southern waterways as a whole during that period, although according to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], as shown by page 17361 of the RECORD, considerably over one-half was for the South.

THE STARTLING APPROPRIATIONS FOR 1914.

A $10,500,000 appropriation for the Mississippi River is amazing because of the following facts:

First. When refusal to appropriate Federal funds to aid private reclamation was put into effect, vast waterway influences, so called, were organized to secure funds from the Government for the Mississippi River land-reclamation scheme.

Second. The 1914 bill carried more money for reclamation of the Mississippi River lands than the entire appropriation for all Government waterways in 1881.

Third. Navigation has decreased 80 per cent on the lower river and is now comparatively small, although the policy of 1881, protesting against the use of money except for navigation, is being completely brushed aside.

I am not expecting to see a change in policy at this time, because "flood protection" and not land reclamation is kept before the people as the issue. Neither do I expect to see a change at this time in the policy of giving $60,000,000, or ten times that amount, of Government money in order to reclaim 20,000,000 acres of land along the lower Mississippi for private parties, land that is not to pay anything for benefits received.

The propaganda carried on by the Mississippi River Levee Association and by the Rivers and Harbors Congress has bewildered Congress and the people into acquiescing in this great land-reclamation scheme at Government expense.

I am confident the appalling raids on the Federal Treasury in the name of "flood protection" are growing in force and frequency, so that the country will soon ask Congress to investigate what this reclamation scheme comprehends.

WASTED MONEY THE REAL ISSUE.

However, these are suggestions that are not involved in the proposition I desire briefly to discuss, and that is the incompetency and waste which characterizes the present levee scheme. I have asked in a resolution for a competent advisory board; a board of distinguished high-class engineers, who will squarely confront the problem and solve it, if it is to be solved. The judgment of Goethals and men of his size would give confidence that the money spent is not entirely wasted, as is now contended. A million dollars spent in ascertaining the truth would be economy, although no one believes it would cost one-tenth of that amount. The present commission is pursuing its own course, and it will do so until the American people are brought face to face with the fact that the Mississippi River reclamation policy has been a drifting policy and a wasteful piece of growing extravagance.

When the river and harbor bill was before the House I believed the subject was of such importance that I discussed the bill at some length. The enormous sums of Government money to be spent on this project, in addition to the great economic loss involved, leads me now to offer opinions of others as to the present levee plan.

AUTHORITIES, NOT PERSONAL OPINIONS, OFFERED.

I have no opinion to express as to what plan should be urged. That is a matter for experts to determine. I do believe that common sense and a knowledge of elementary physics will serve to discredit the present plan. One of the witnesses whose word is of more than ordinary value is Gen. Herman Haupt, known throughout the country as an eminent military and civil engineer, a man who died several years ago. Gen. Haupt left a pamphlet of great value to the country at this particular time. Gen. Haupt was an engineer, author, and inventor of wide experience and high character. The positions he occupied as engineer of railroads and other great corporations, including at one time the city of Philadelphia, entitle his words to more than ordinary weight.

In a remarkable pamphlet issued a few years ago, entitled "The Problem of the Mississippi," he presents a strong, comprehensive arraignment of the present system. On page 8 he says:

> Charles Ellet, who represented the United States Government in connection with river investigation in 1851, was sufficiently bold to assert that to sustain a flood of the velocity of that of 1851 the levees must be made at least 2 feet higher from Red River to New Orleans, for which assertion he was in 1861 severely criticized by the representatives of Government in charge of river matters. Instead of 2 feet levees are now [at the time he was speaking] 5 feet higher than in 1857. The estimate of the Government engineers in 1861 for complete protection from Cairo to the Gulf, including value of existing levees, was $26,000,000. There have been expended since 1861 in levees still incomplete more than $5,000,000, and the cost of the levee system when completed will not be less than $100,000,000.

Since that day the total has doubled in amount. One might imagine this was a chapter from engineers' estimates on the Coosa or the Red or the Black Warrior or the Trinity or a hundred other streams on which Government engineers have increased their estimates. Gen. Haupt, in presenting his case against the present levee system, calls upon the opinion of Mr. L. W. Brown, civil engineer, wherein Mr. Brown asks:

> Has the Mississippi River Commission such knowledge and has it made such investigation as one necessary to determine that the bed of the river is not being lengthened? If they have, why is not this most valuable information made public? If the flood elevations are increased, as past experience teaches us they have been, and if they have occasioned a decrease in the slope of the whole river, as is shown to be the case, although not published by the commission, by what hydraulic laws would the deduction be made that the bed is not fouling? If no phenomenon has occurred which was not anticipated by them, the commission is responsible for the losses this country sustained in 1897, amounting to upward of $100,000,000.

Two further brief extracts are quoted. On page 20 Gen. Haupt says:

> It has been shown that before the river was interfered with by the construction of continuous levees the changes in flood elevations were very slow, only 1 foot in 90 years, while the construction of levees has caused a rise as great as 1 foot in 2½ years.

A further extract from page 23 is directly to the point when he says:

> No single plan of improvement can solve the problem of the Mississippi—neither levees, outlets, waste wiers, or diversions will singly be sufficient, but a combination of all, directed by intelligence. Levees are required for local protection, but a system of continuous levees for highest floods from Cairo to the Gulf is the worst that could have been conceived.

CONTINUOUS LEVEES ARE VALUELESS.

Surely the last statement is significant when we are appropriating for the levee system more per year than we did for the whole country a little over a score of years ago.

Prof. Lewis M. Haupt, a son of Gen. Haupt, a civil engineer of high standing, has made a study of conditions on the Mississippi River, and has presented several instructive papers on the subject, which it is impossible to more than refer to briefly.

In an address before the Franklin Institute on "Controlling the floods of the Mississippi River" he says, after discussing the great loss of property through floods:

> In behalf of the engineering profession it seems necessary to state the responsibility for these disasters does not rest with it, since Congress has the sole jurisdiction and control of these questions and its attention has frequently been called by engineers and river men to remedial measures which have not been adopted. The real causes may better be ascribed to politics and local interests, as may be illustrated by the following reported interview with one of the most sagacious railroad magnates of the country (Jay Gould), now deceased, who, on being requested to lend his aid to the passage of an act which would have provided earlier relief to the Mississippi Valley, is said to have replied: "I have read all the arguments before Congress. The outlet system is correct and the only way to deepen the Mississippi River. If that were done, what would become of not only my own but all other railroads coming to New York?" They would be ruined, and for that reason he would favor the levee system, for so long as that be kept up there need be no fears of the Mississippi as a competitor.

If Jay Gould were alive to-day his road and every other railway in the Mississippi Valley would join the railways that are now contributing to the support of the Mississippi River Levee Association.

Several years ago Prof. Haupt presented a strong comprehensive report on the Mississippi River problem, which reached the same conclusions as those formed by Gen. Haupt, Charles Ellett, and Mr. Brown.

Believing that a personal letter, one of a large number received from Prof. Haupt during the past six months, may throw additional light on the Mississippi levee system, I quote brief passages:

CYNWYD, PA., September 28, 1914.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 26th is at hand, and I hasten to comply, feeling that the almost lifelong study I have given the question may not have been in vain when carefully considered by unbiased interests. You have sized up the situation as to levees, and the demand made upon the Government to aid in them under the guise of improving navigation, but, as Senator Berry said, it was a blind, since Congress had no authority to go into reclamation of lands.

One of the best men, thoroughly familiar with the river, is Lyman E. Cooley, civil engineer, of Chicago, also James Sedden, of St. Louis, both of whom were in the service of the United States in early years. Others, now deceased, like Prof. Johnson, Brown, Starling, etc., have left their record. Ockerson and Taylor, who are still on the commission, are very capable and well-informed men, but in the minority.

Sedden's papers and hydrographs indicated a rational system for protection from floods and providing an adequate navigation by lateral reservoirs in the waste lands, but this is only a partial remedy, and it has been vigorously opposed by levee advocates by stating they would be wholly inadequate.

I can not go into details, but for all the remedial elements will refer you to the letter I sent Judge BURTON extracted from the Transportation Crisis (a copy of which I think I sent you some time ago), vide page 20 in the Great Basin, and page 27, the Great Belt Route—Levees and Navigation.

The letter referred to making inquiries was from Senator Brice, of Ohio, 1887. This was 27 years ago, since when probably over $100,000,000 have been expended and the 9-foot stage has not been secured on either the Ohio or the Mississippi. See the confession made by the commission of 1900 (p. 29): "It is continually making experiments looking to the best use of available material when Congress shall provide for such a systematic improvement."

ENGINEERS, NOT CONGRESS, ARE RESPONSIBLE.

This it seems is not the duty of Congress, as it is an engineering question and has not been satisfactorily solved, since the policy is vacillating and the attempt seems to be made to correct the river locally by patchwork instead of as a whole by applying physical laws to the entire basin.

See V. P. 41 (2) giving a summary of the fifth of this series of papers. I send a blue leaflet, No. 2, giving extracts from Maj. Guin, United States engineer, and the various estimates. Since then many of the natural outlets have been closed in efforts to force all the water through the Passes to scour out the bars, but overlooking the fact that the mud remains to be ejected at the outlets, thus increasing the rate of advance of the bars and the amount of dredging.

While the United States engineers are absolutely independent of politics they are also not amenable to the electorate (the people), hence are virtually unaccountable to anyone for their mistakes, and the officials change their posts so often that they can not even assume the honor or responsibility for results. I say this without criticism, for it is the radical fault of the system.

Continuing, as to interference with the power of the engineers, who control the river and harbor projects of the country, Prof. Haupt says:

They are intrenched behind the Treasury, but as the Missouri Commission was abolished for insufficient results it may be possible to follow the precedent and satisfy the public that their levees and property will be better secured by the use of all remedies available instead of the single one—the levee system—which must ultimately bring disaster and destruction, because there is no escape for the silt.

THE REAL PROJECT.

In conclusion Prof. Haupt makes this cogent statement:

As you have asked for my candid opinion, I have not hesitated to give it, so that perchance it may lead to a change of policy for the public weal. The public at large is not interested, so long as they do not own plantations behind the levees; and those who do, demand the protection of private property, which is given without legal sanction and paid for by the Nation. The money is virtually wasted in redoubts and intrenchments—against an invisible foe—which can not escape, but builds its own counterscarps, scales the barriers, and destroys the innocent citizens living under their shelter.

Very respectfully, yours, LEWIS M. HAUPT.

On the day following the introduction of the Mississippi River resolution, I received personal words of commendation from high authority here in Washington, stating that my premises were right, the present system wasteful and disastrous, and the only protection to the country would be by the appointment of a high-class temporary advisory board, as I proposed, to make an investigation and report without delay. I was assured that such a board would unhesitatingly condemn the present extravagant and wasteful scheme, which is unsound in character but continues to receive the approval of an ossified policy, as fixed and immovable as the prejudices which governed the persecutors of Columbus.

I do not offer this statement by way of argument, but to show the difficulty surrounding efforts to obtain the truth, when officials and competent authorities feel obliged to write "personal" at the top of their communications for obvious reasons—and I have received many such messages during the six months' consideration of the river and harbor pork barrel.

ANOTHER ENGINEER'S STATEMENT.

A strong, fearless man who has a long list of accomplishments to his credit, and who has frequently pointed out to me the disastrous Mississippi River policy now being undertaken by the Government, is Mr. Carroll L. Riker, of Brooklyn, an engineer of large experience in waterway work. Mr. Riker believes he has solved the Mississippi River problem, and has presented a bill to that effect, now before Congress. While it appears to be reasonable and logical to the layman, I have no opinion to express as to its merits, nor does Mr. Riker ask for its support until he has convinced Congress that the present system is wrong and, to use his words, "criminally wasteful."

With unbounded courage he guarantees to compel admissions of incompetency of the present plan from the Army Engineers themselves if he can secure a hearing—and no man can listen to his plain, common-sense exposition of the Mississippi River problem without being impressed by his sincerity and ability. Mr. Riker has accomplished some important things in the way of public engineering service that can not be disputed, and I believe he would be able to convince any unprejudiced man or body, if given a hearing, that the present Mississippi River improvement scheme is as bad as he declares it to be.

Mr. Riker is a mild-mannered man, who, however, does not mince words when he says, in a statement made to me:

The plans of the United States Army Engineers for the control of the Mississippi River are the greatest engineering blunders which have ever been perpetrated upon a nation. These plans show that they do not understand the underlying and first principle which naturally governs the flow of a river.

If an advisory board of consulting engineers be appointed who are not graduates of West Point to investigate these plans, and they used as data only that which is printed and officially indorsed by these Army engineers, they would certainly confirm the above statement after less than 24 hours of actual consideration.

Mr. Riker then engages in a technical, but clearly presented, discussion of river currents and other related influences which I will not quote; but he further adds some information in unmistakable English which the lay mind can easily digest. He says:

These United States Army engineers for more than 50 years have uniformly shown ignorance of the existence of the greatest law in the universe, that of contrifugal force, or the law of straight tendency, which is constantly exerting its influence to straighten the course of all rivers and, where obstructions to such a course are removed, maintains rivers in a course as straight as an arrow. * * * This straight tendency, which is due to the influence of centrifugal force, causes all matter in motion to move in a straight line and unlike that of any other force increases with the square of velocity of the matter in motion. * * * This force influencing the waters of the Mississippi River to maintain a straight line increases sixty-four fold as the velocity of its waters increase from one-half mile per hour to 4 miles per hour.

EMBALMED FALLACIES OF ENGINEERS.

Referring to authorities that have been the fetish of Mississippi River work, he says:

The embalmed fallacies of Humphries and Abbott have been blindly followed for more than 50 years by these engineers, who have built dikes, revetments, and levees at the cost of more than a hundred million dollars in their efforts to make this river pursue a crooked and unnatural course, wholly in opposition to all of nature's natural inclinations.

There are engineers of the Army who would not commit themselves to these blunders The president of the Mississippi River Commission represents those who do and expresses their views on this question in the following paragraph contained in his report bearing date of May 16, 1913, to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in reply to the request of the President for information on this subject:

"Cut-offs: By cutting off the bends in a river, its length is diminished and slope increased. This would increase its discharge at a given height. This method of relief can not be applied to the Mississippi River, as it would seriously injure its navigability during low water, and increase the caving of its banks, which is now excessive. While it would afford relief in the upper portions of the river thus straightened, it would increase flood heights at the lower end, benefiting one locality at the expense of another." (See Appendix A, p. 11.)

When the engineering profession have had their attention specifically drawn to the facts connected with the present plans of the Army engineers for control of this river it will entail a national engineering disgrace that is unavoidable. Thirty-four annual reports of the Mississippi River Commission, concurred in by the various Chiefs of Engineers, United States Army, then acting, are mute witnesses against them that can never be effaced. There is not one word that can be uttered in extenuation of these blunders which have been perpetrated by these engineers upon the citizens of the United States for a lifetime. They are now preparing a trap for the unconscious, confiding settlers in the valley of that river which will terminate in a terrible catastrophe as certain as the sun is to rise unless the present program be radically modified.

Mr. Speaker, it may be said by those who are criticized that personal interest influences the judgment of men who are not Army engineers. It is an argument used at both ends of the Capitol by statesmen of greater or less caliber, who impugn motives of personal interest to every act, and who ascribe disappointment or other unworthy influences to all criticisms of the pork barrel. Such replies will have no weight with those in search of the truth, and I am sure the common-sense proposition offered by the eminent men I have quoted can not be scoffed out of court much longer.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION'S DEMAND OF $12,000,000 FOR 1915.

If any corroboration is needed of lack of knowledge and understanding of the Mississippi River problem, then an examination of the testimony of Judge R. S. Taylor, of the Mississippi River Commission, taken by the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, will convince doubters. Other amazing confessions of uncertainty and doubt appear in the hearings conducted before the Senate committee, and yet, with an audacity possessed only by a Col. Fox, with whom we may later become acquainted, the Mississippi River Commission demands $12,000,000 for that river in 1915. Even this extravagant amount does not satisfy all land reclamationists along the lower stretch of the river, persons who see visions of wealth whenever the present worthless lands along the river are reclaimed by the taxpayers of the country through the agency of a Federal Treasury.

Read House Report No. 390 of this Sixty-third Congress. It relates to claims for damages against the Government because of improper levee plans on the Mississippi River. Nothing further is required to place a seal of condemnation on the Government's handling of the Mississippi problem. I quoted from this report in my remarks contained in the RECORD for June 19. It is an astounding fact that we continue to annually pour millions into the river without any comprehensive plan or permanent results in mind. What is the reason? Who is responsible for this enormous waste of Government funds? Everybody places the burden on the shoulders of some other body. Why not get at the facts by passing my resolution?

WHAT DO THE RIVER PEOPLE SAY?

Those who are familiar with local conditions declare misfortune has been shrewdly capitalized and the Government Treasury is the goal of those who, in the aggregate, have many hundreds of millions of dollars at stake through a reclaimed land scheme. I am not able at this time to discuss the selfish purposes behind the Mississippi River improvement scheme, but I am endeavoring to show that though the Government pours its millions into the river for the benefit of reclamationists the supposed beneficiaries will not receive any anticipated benefit, because the improvements will not be permanent.

The present plan does not deceive many people along the river valley, as I propose to show. Without means of securing all the information I would gladly present, I offer such proof as has accidentally fallen into my hands.

On September 28, 1914, the New Orleans Item printed an editorial which relates to several matters involved in this discussion, all of which may not be strictly pertinent to this particular point, but it clearly shows a leading publication of the great Queen City is not in sympathy with the Mississippi River Levee Association, the present system of river levee improvements, or the 1914 pork barrel. For all of these reasons the Item is entitled, in my humble judgment, to the thanks of the Mississippi Valley, which looks for permanent improvement of the river, not extravagance, waste, and a blindness to impending danger. I place the editorial in the RECORD because it is relevant to the subject:

[From the New Orleans Item, September 28, 1914.]

THE PORK BARREL, US, AND OUR NEIGHBOR.

"From the news column of The Item we learn that Congressman FREAR, of Wisconsin, proposes to introduce a resolution directing the Attorney General to investigate alleged lobbying activities of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and the Mississippi River Levee Association:

"The grounds are that they have brought improper influences to bear in favor of the rivers and harbors bill; that they are using agents and newspapers to stir up sentiment * * *; that they have collected money for their propaganda from various commercial and railway bodies * * *; that they have assumed to dictate to Members of Congress how to vote; and that they are carrying on an insidious lobby.

"These grounds are so nearly identical with those on which The Item and Mr. George H. Maxwell, champion of the Newlands bill, and Mr. J. J. Hill's ready typewriter, have based their own fight against the Ransdell-Humphreys bill that we have an idea that these are the sources from which Mr. FREAR has gathered his alleged information."—New Orleans States.

This statement of the case and the "idea" of our sad contemporary are alike utterly untrue and needlessly incorrect. When we recall the blunders into which The States boggled in its efforts to misrepresent the attitude of President Wilson and the governor of Ohio on the problem of river control, however, we have no reason to anticipate that anything but profound ignorance and destructive prejudice will shape the utterances of our esteemed contemporary on this subject.

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress conducts a national lobby for the pork-barrel bill.

The Mississippi River Levee Association was organized by some railroad interests who do not want genuine and permanent stream control, because it threatens competition by levee-board politicians and levee contractors whose jobs and profits depend upon the perpetuation of the stupid and vicious old system of disjointed levee maintenance under which the people of the valley have been bled and pillaged, both ignorantly and willfully, for the past generation, and left hopelessly exposed to terrible floods at the end of the process. The genii that framed this latter organization also framed a bill, and Mr. RANSDELL and Congressman HUMPHREYS of Mississippi let their names be tacked to it.

The two institutions are ostensibly separate.

The statement that the Item or Mr. Maxwell attacked the Rivers and Harbors Congress is untrue. Our general attitude toward it has been a feeling that if the Federal Treasury is to be looted for the selfish purposes of Congressmen and local interests that have strings on Congressmen, our own part of the country had as well have its share of the loot. The managers of the Newlands campaign have gone further than that, however, and figured on using whatever could be derived from this bill as an adjunct to Mississippi appropriations under the Newlands bill.

What the item has done in this matter is to tell its readers the simple truth about the standing of this pork-barrel measure before the people of the country. We have not been ignorant or dishonest about it. We told you a year ago that the feeling of the Nation against the abuses of the pork barrel was approaching a climax so rapidly that it was utterly unsafe to trust to the barrel for any adequate relief from floods. We warned you that the country would not allow many more pork barrels to be opened. We advised some other method, and led the fight for the Newlands bill as the best one.

The Item has been the only newspaper in New Orleans to take this course. The result vindicates its stand. We have been bitterly berated for this course by the other three newspapers. Ignorance or untruth alone can account for their behavior. We urge you to be charitable in determining for yourself to which their course is chargeable.

The Item's readers know from its past exposures that the Mississippi Valley Levee Association is built on a foundation of railroad cash. It is a pleasure to note that the Item's photographic proof of this fact was exhibited to the Senate during the recent debate. Everybody ought to know the truth.

Our contemporary's statement of Mr. FREAR'S attitude on the pork-barrel lobby, with which the Item had nothing whatever to do, is quite incorrect. He did not object to the fact that the managers of the "congress" have "collected money for their propaganda." He charged that they used solicitors for this purpose and paid these solicitors one-half of the money thus collected from innocents who thought they were giving up their cash for legitimate constructive waterway promotion, and could not have known that half of it stayed with the seductive gentlemen who took it away from them.

How would you like to hand a persuasive gentleman $10 "for rivers and harbors" promotion, knowing that he was going to keep $5 for his own drinks, cigars, and board bill?

The States' idea that we furnished the information for this charge to Mr. FREAR does us too much honor. The source of it appears on page 16785 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the current term, in the following language:

"Mr. KENYON. Now, where does the money come from to carry on this great propaganda throughout this country? Why should it be necessary for large sums of money to be spent in giving dredgers' association banquets to influential citizens, as I have here read from their statements? * * *

"I want to get into the record, which I am trying to preserve for the people of this country, who are going to pass on this question eventually, a letter, which I am authorized to use, to Mr. FREAR, of Wisconsin, who fought this bill in the House almost alone. * * * This letter is from Mr. Richard M. McCann, the publisher of Waterways and Commerce, a monthly magazine. * * * In it he says:

"'I inclose herewith original subscription lists obtained from a canvasser named Mr. John M. Williams, of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, who received 50 per cent for obtaining the amounts set opposite each name. As you will see, the subscriptions cover 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912.'"

The States could not have expressed such a blundering "idea" as that we have just exploded except in utter ignorance of a public record open to everybody.

The self-intoxication of politician journalism was never better exemplified than in our contemporary's further language:

"We trust that the Item's cup of satisfaction is full now that the Republican filibusters have succeeded in striking $4,500,000 from the appropriation provided for the Mississippi, and thus very largely increase the peril which must confront the people of Louisiana and Mississippi when the next great flood comes rolling down. It is to be entitled to share whatever credit may be due for the blow at our security, and it may be added that no Senator who voted against the bill can be blamed for doing so when he can point to a New Orleans newspaper for vindication of his course."

Is our befuddled neighbor not a little premature in its mathematics? Hasn't $20,000,000 been left to the Army engineers for use in their discretion? They say they do not know yet how they will apportion it. Is the colonel their boss, too? Is he going to limit his suffering people to such a trifle as three and a half millions?

And suppose we had got "our" eight millions, which was merely a figment of Mr. RANSDELL'S fruitless imagination—he was imagining $60,000,000 at the same time—what "peril" would it have "averted"? Would it not have been merely a continuation of the "delightful stream of scattered driblets," as the classic JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS once phrased it, that are just enough to glide into the river by the time the next high water comes up? Has it not been a generation of pork-barrel driblets and political newspaperdom that destroyed Dayton and submerged a score of Louisiana parishes at the end?

We do not accept our good neighbor's well-meant statement of the case, but lest there be any doubt about it, we hasten to assure everybody that we are quite proud of our contribution to the enlightenment of a suffering people, oppressed by log-rolling politicians and benighted by an ignorant and incompetent press, upon the fundamental causes that keep the pall of flood above them.

From Memphis, a city that has suffered through the ill-advised experiments of Army engineers, comes a note of warning in two editorials forwarded to me by a gentleman who appears to understand the Mississippi River problem better than those who are now disbursing Government funds for an impractical levee scheme.

The News Scimitar, of Memphis, on November 26, 1913, gave a clean-cut expression of the views of the people it represents in the second great city of the Mississippi River Valley. It is as follows:

[From the Memphis News Scimitar, November 26, 1913.]

ON TO WASHINGTON.

After a Peter the Hermit campaign, carried on by Evangelist John A. Fox, at the expense of the railroads, for several months, in which a purely unreckoning and mechanical sentiment has been worked up in favor of the futile "levees-only" idea, a descent is to be made on Washington in the near future, through which, by a show of numbers, Congress is to be coerced into siphoning out of the Treasury $60,000,000 for a continuation of the mud-pie system of confining the waters of the Mississippi River at flood tide. Anticipation is cloud piercing, and the bird of hope is soaring high without moulting a feather in the ranks of the political levee boards up and down the river, while the absentee Mississippi River Commission fancies it sees before it a new lease of life. In spite of all this, there will be snags encountered in the stream. * * *

It is not unknown in Congress and throughout the country that those cooing turtle doves, the political levee boards, * * * are thoroughly discredited by the property owners, and that they maintain a show of vitality by shaking hands with each other. The "indorsements" so much touted mean nothing more than the price which various organizations that care nothing and know nothing about the question are willing to pay to be let alone. They have all been appealed to, barring the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Hod Carriers' Union, with the same result, which meant, "Take it and get away."

For 200 years the levee system has been tried and found wanting, and the more money that is spent on levees the more disastrous do they become.

Valuable lands on the outside of the levees have been rendered worthless by the increased elevation of of the flood heights, and no consideration is given these people or their 9,000 square miles of territory in the way of reimbursement. Memphis has suffered sorely as a result of levees, and is now asked to join in the clamor for more levees.

Congress is asked for $60,000,000, while it is admitted that no proper surveys have been made, and under the present pork-barrel system there is no assurance that competent engineers will have the work in charge.

Figures will not yield to clamor. In 1882, with 52 feet of water on the gauge at Cairo, the stage at Memphis was 35 feet, there being no levees on the Arkansas side. Every part of the city was above water. In 1913 Cairo had a stage of 56 feet, while Memphis was submerged and much property destroyed by a stage of 46.5 feet, or an increase of 11.5 feet over the stage of 1882. We are issuing bonds for local protection while being called upon at the same time to ask for more money and more levees, which are making local expenditure for self-preservation necessary.

The old brutal logic that we must "get some of that Yankee money down here" is no longer appealing. The Mississippi River Commission has been discredited by its own reluctant admissions. The political levee boards have been discredited by the people and the logic of events. We must have a new deal and a square deal. We must adopt new and better methods. We must put new and better men in charge, and we must make provision to reimburse those whose property the levee system has destroyed.

Listen to the following denunciation from the Memphis Press of September 12, 1914:

THE "PORK BARREL" IS AN ENEMY OF NAVIGATION.

We have told our readers on many occasions that the conscience of the Nation was revolting against the "pork barrel."

We told them that we were crucifying our own chances for permanent relief from floods and from permanent reestablishment of navigation when we continued longer to put our faith in the hodge podge, wasteful, selfish, aimless conglomeration of good, useless, and evil projects annually or biennially labeled the "rivers and harbors bill."

The method of the rivers and harbors bill is indefensible, and the results of that method pursued through generations are its own damnation.

* * * * * * *

The would-be perpetrators of the "pork barrel" are the enemies of the comprehensive program, the enemies of real safety, the enemies of revived navigation.

It is not going too far to say they are, in effect, traitors to the Republic.

Another illuminating editorial on the same general subject criticizes the Army engineers' levees without gloves. It is short and I insert it entire:

[From the Memphis News Scimitar, January 12, 1914.]

FLOOD CONTROL.

The consensus of opinion among experts is that the fundamental defect of the Ransdell-Humphreys bill is that, although it professes to be in aid of navigation, it provides for large expenditures for levees, which increase the rapidity and total volume of the caving of the banks into the river. The Chief of Engineers reported to the Secretary of War that until the caving of banks into the Mississippi below St. Louis can be stopped it is practically hopeless to expect any improvement of low-water conditions in the river. In other words, the stream can not be continued navigable.

It is estimated that there are 749 miles of caving banks on the lower Mississippi, from which 9 acres in area by 66 feet deep for each mile is thrown in the stream, which in 50 years would mean half a million acres of land to a depth of 66 feet tumbled in to obstruct navigation.

* * * * * * *

It is claimed by those high in authority that the Ransdell-Humphreys bill should be entitled "A bill to destroy the navigability of the Mississippi River, and to eventually make it impossible to protect the valley from devastation by floods."

This is just what the railroads want, and have been working for so successfully, and this is why they are behind the levees-only people, who are making so much noise, but which is "all cry and little wool." The more that people investigate the matter the more they see the futility of patchwork and mud pies. Those who have been forced to study the question because it has been brought home to them, like Mayor Reubenstein, of Stockton, Cal., who has had experience in the San Joaquin Valley, know something about flood control. In replying to a communication from Secretary Fox, of the local association, Mayor Reubenstein exposes the fallacies contained in the Ransdell-Humphreys bill, and states: "Fortunately for our country a plan has been submitted that is sufficiently comprehensive to insure an orderly start on this great work, and with ample means for its successful completion."

I would willingly print additional personal letters and opinions regarding the extravagance, waste, and utter uselessness of the present Mississippi River reclamation scheme, but I have already devoted more time to consideration of that river than I first intended. If I have presented sufficient proof of the failure of the present project to awaken interest at either end of the Capitol to prevent wasteful appropriations reaching upward to eight and ten millions of dollars annually, if I can secure a fair hearing for House concurrent resolution No. 50, which proposes an investigation by an advisory board, if I am able to resurrect the resolution from the committee morgue, to which it has been consigned, together with other resolutions and to which I propose briefly to refer, then I shall feel an effort in exposing the utter wastefulness of the lower Mississippi River reclamation pork barrel has not been in vain.

I am not easily discouraged, Mr. Speaker, and, although I make no prediction as to any investigation into the Mississippi levee scheme, I am confident that ultimate failure and waste will bring about such investigation in the not far-distant future and that condemnation will be visited then upon the heads of Army engineers, instead of upon Congress, where the responsibility should primarily rest.

DIFFERENT PROJECTS HERETOFORE DISCUSSED.

Before I take up one further subject, which I believe is of far more importance than the Mississippi River reclamation project, bad as that is, I desire to say that in my attempt to call attention to the bad features of the project I have been actuated by a purpose to secure, if possible, an investigation of the whole river and harbor proposition. On other occasions I have discussed the $83,000,000 Ohio River canalization project and the $20,000,000 Missouri River project, showing the character of traffic in each and the average cost per ton to the Government of freight carried through the locks or over on the Missouri. (RECORD of April 10, June 3, June 8, and June 19.) In like manner I have tried to show the railway control of terminals at Philadelphia, Providence, Pittsburgh, Cairo, and elsewhere, as appears in my remarks of June 19 last. The chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, who has ever treated me with unvarying courtesy, said to me recently, "Whatever else may be said of your criticism of projects in the rivers and harbors bill, you play no favorites." I have no conscious prejudice on the subject. Legitimate appropriations for actual navigation will not be opposed by anyone, if for public use. I believe contributions from localities benefited should generally be demanded in order to avoid a grab-bag policy; but I am firmly convinced that to pay money out of the Federal Treasury for land reclamation schemes, water-power projects, fertilizer plants, or harbors where public terminals do not exist is wrong and vicious and leads to corruption and to the infamous "pork barrel."

A GREAT ISSUE IS INVOLVED.

I desire to consider briefly one other phase of river and harbor legislation. While the "pork barrel" of 1914 was cut from $53,000,000 in cash and $32,000,000 in new continuing projects down to a $20,000,000 lump-sum pork keg, future barrels will be encountered next year and every year thereafter as long as present conditions exist. A victory of $33,000,000 saved to the country in cash and $32,000,000 in new projects begun, or $65,000,000, is to the credit of those who carried on the fight in the United States Senate, with equal credit to the press and all other agencies which helped to bring about the result.

It may make Army engineers and "pork-barrel" builders more cautious for a time, but we must not delude ourselves into the belief that "pork barrels" will go out of fashion. They will threaten the American people as long as the present system, within and without Congress, continues to exist.

A little over a decade ago a new factor sprang into existence that has served to exaggerate former "pork-barrel" evils. Waterway associations were organized in different parts of the country to urge upon public attention and upon Congress waterway improvements for different projects. The Mississippi Levee Association, the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, and a number of other waterway organizations from the Atlantic to the Pacific, largely composed of public-spirited, strong men in each community, all pulling for the particular project in which that association was interested. Soon thereafter it occurred to a promoter that if a trust or monopoly was a good thing in business for those interested, although injurious to the nine hundred and ninety-nine outside of the business monopoly, the same principle could be applied to annual raids on Uncle Samuel's Treasury.

AN ANNUAL $50,000,000 LOOT TRUST.

A trust organization of all the waterway associations was thereupon formed that chose for its battle cry "$50,000,000 annually for waterways." Good, bad, or indifferent, all were welcome in order to insure a $50,000,000 annual grab. In order to give force and character to the new waterway loot, trust officials were chosen who had great legislative influence directly and indirectly at Washington.

Quarters were engaged at Washington covering practically the entire floor of one of the largest business blocks in the city, and some of the brightest and ablest publicity agents in the country were engaged by this $50,000,000 loot concern, which in its literature declared itself to be "second in importance only to the Congress of the United States."

From an humble beginning it grew in aggressiveness until it dominated the framing of annual "pork barrels." Ten days before the bill was reported from the Senate committee in 1914 this $50,000,000 annual loot organization sent out from its headquarters in Washington to the press of the country a statement, which read as follows:

While the river and harbor appropriation bill is still held in the Senate Committee on Commerce and the additions made to the House bill are still subject to the secrecy that is put upon members of committees dealing with appropriations until the bills are finally reported to the Senate, enough has been learned to predict that the Senate Committee on Commerce has increased or added to the waterway bills some $10,000,000.

The prediction was verified to the exact amount. Ten million dollars was loaded on to the House pork barrel of $43,289,004, and the bill was reported out of committee at $53,641,600. And it must not be forgotten that some of the worst projects disclosed in the House bill, including the Kissimmee, Oklawaha, and Mattawan Creek, were stricken out of the bill before it was reported by the committee to the Senate.

DO THE OFFICERS REPRESENT THE MEMBERS?

Whatever opportunities for securing special inside information are possessed by the Rivers and Harbors Congress or any other organization would be developed by House concurrent resolution No. 49 if an investigation could be had with power to subpœna witnesses and compel the production of books. I do not overlook the fact that great waterway organizations, made up of honest, public-spirited men, are accustomed to choose for administrative offices men of ability and influence in Congress who can be induced to act in that capacity. It is also fair to presume that the affairs of such organizations are managed and determined by those officers during the interim between annual meetings. I am not questioning the sincerity of such officials nor their own honesty of purpose in supporting any project, however wasteful or visionary it may seem to me.

When, however, they decide to throw the influence of the organization in favor of a pork-barrel bill, whose contents are not known to a handful of Members, then I believe they usurp the authority with which they are clothed. When such officials, occupying legislative seats at either end of the Capitol, consent to and approve back-fires, fictitious demands, or threats based on wrong premises, all to be directed at legislators who are trying to honestly and patriotically represent their constituents and their country under their oaths of office, then I believe it is time to expose the worst secret lobby and most powerful influence that ever advocated any appropriation is that which now exists behind the annual pork barrel. If any member of any organization encourages such lobbying, he is equally responsible, but I do not believe the average member has any knowledge of the character of bills that are known as pork barrels, nor do I believe he would authorize anyone to represent him in an effort to force a vicious bill through Congress. It is with no desire to reflect upon the purposes of any organization, with two exceptions, or upon the membership of any organization, in any case, that I submit th following facts, which have induced me to introduce resolutions of inquiry.

SOME FACTS CONCERNING THE LOBBY.

Individually, with the handicap of inexperience and no authority to investigate, any first-term Member is helpless to get at many facts, and yet I believe what I am about to submit imperatively demands from us an investigation, in order that Congress and the country may know what secret influences are employed to esecure the passage of annual $50,000,000 river and harbor bills. What amounts of money are used and for what purpose, what political influence is secretly employed to further the barrel's course, and just how far particular interests, including engineers, dredgers, and contractors, are engaged in efforts to push the barrel.

I am prepared to show that to some degree they work together, and it is difficult to determine without an effective investigation just how far the activities of one special interest are separate from other interests that are to be financially benefited by the passage of an annual pork-barrel bill, but the facts submitted speak for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, the dredgers of the country have a special interest in the passage of all river and harbor bills, and are found among the contributors toward waterway organizations that are annually trying to push through a $50,000,000 pork barrel. I will present connecting evidence hereafter. Here is a secret, confidential report that is illuminating:

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE ATLANTIC AND GULF COAST DREDGE OWNERS' ASSOCIATION, MARCH 13, 1901.

To the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association.

GENTLEMEN: In accordance with the constitution, rules, and by-laws of this association, your board of directors, through your president, present for your consideration herewith their report for the year ending February 13, 1901, adding thereto such recommendations and suggestions as your board have considered during the past year.

The year just closing, the eighteenth year of the association, and the years since its organization have been marked by constant and faithful effort to promote, through the means of general work and enterprise, everything that will make for the good of every operator enrolled in its membership. Measures have been constantly brought to your attention and every effort made to uplift our business and protect it in all proper and legitimate channels.

These efforts have been more or less successful, but always along the line of an earnest endeavor to conserve the real interests of our business.

During the past year your board have especially taken up for consideration the question of its department for fixing prices on work and the allotment of work through the commissioners of that department, and have carefully studied the problems which present themselves in connection with that line of work.

The department in question was not originally contemplated by the founders of this association, nor was it intended as any part of the work for which the association was formed.

The organization had its origin in the recognized desire of many operators in the dredging business for effective cooperation in many important fields of work, where the general interests of their business had long been neglected. It was felt by the progressive men who had invested large amounts of capital in this business that an organization of operators could be effected by the Atlantic coast, whose duty and object would be the closer affiliation of operators, and the combination of the talent and energy in the business for the promotion by all lawful means for the advancement of their business, and to present a united front, supported by united resources, to meet and overcome any and all obstacles then existing or thereafter appearing.

IN UNION THERE IS STRENGTH.

It was the old and tried principle, to wit, "In union there is strength" and "A house divided against itself falls," and the keynote of all successful organizations must be that very same principle. Following this rule, the effort of this association should have been confined entirely to meeting and overcoming obstacles which come from without—fighting the common enemy, so to speak. This would mean the promotion of all measures for urging public bodies to undertake public improvements in submarine work, compelling the enactment of reasonable laws governing our work, and the repeal of obnoxious and vexatious laws; experiments in all branches of machinery and devices used in our business, and a general department for furnishing to each member information desired by him regarding any particular work, or concerning which other members may have knowledge, giving in every way to each member the fullest possible data regarding dredging operations on the coast and the history of each piece of work.

So many measures of general interest and value are included in the work that could be successfully performed by an association to the advantage of its members, and so much can be done in the way of promoting good fellowship amongst them by means of this organization, and also by entertaining prominent and influential men at its banquets and through special committees that enumeration here of all these different and important measures is unnecessary.

Any thoughtful man who is engaged in our business can readily see how important it is that an efficient organization of operators should be maintained to promote measures of general interest and value.

QUARRELING OVER SPOILS.

Some years after the organization was effected an element entered into its work which has almost crowded out all features of general work and has practically turned the association, which was originally formed for general benefits only, into a special organization for the distribution of work and apportionment of contracts. Starting, as it did, in the desire to combine against outsiders, it has ended in combining against itself; and instead of its members standing together to promote the business of dredging in all its general and important details, as above mentioned, we behold a spectacle of members quarreling one with another over the division of work, and each one complaining that the association is a failure because it does not give to each one all the work that he feels is his due, each member forgetting that the association simply undertook this duty because it was forced upon it, and because other agencies to do that work had failed, and because the operators on the Atlantic coast refused to enter into proper arrangements for dividing work amongst them and preferred to load this work upon the association, a work for which the latter was unfitted, for which it was never intended or formed, and the only excuse for foisting this measure upon it was apparently the dredging operators failed to appreciate that this kind of work was done in other lines of business by special pools organized for no other purpose and specially organized for that purpose alone.

It is time that all thoughtful men in this association pause and consider whether the association is to blame for failing to perform a task entirely beyond its powers or resources, and also whether it would be well for the association to reject this burden and relegate it to proper agencies and take up the duties for which it was organized.

We think it is time that this be done and this bone of contention removed from the midst of our association and the members once more united and working along the lines of common interest. Little of the real value of this association has been demonstrated or developed of recent years and much disagreement and bitterness has come between the members in that time, and all because the association has neglected its real duties and buried itself with false ones. The former would bind its members more firmly together, whereas the latter simply disintegrates our ranks.

It is certainly time that this "Jonah" be thrown overboard and left to the tender mercies of some sufficient "whale" or "pool" and the association be permitted to again bend to its task and resume its long interrupted voyage.

In presenting these views to the members, your board feel that they are simply pointing out the pitfall into which this association has become entangled, and which has retarded its growth and usefulness for some years and has brought upon it an immense amount of work foreign to its proper duties. Much of the dissatisfaction has been due to this very cause, and members have been alienated whose assistance was of the greatest value to us. We have seen the camel crowd into our tent and force out everything else, and it is time that this fruitless and thankless task, which was put upon the association, be now put off, and the department created for the allotment and apportionment of dredging work and contracts be abandoned and all rules pertaining thereto be repealed.

The association should, on the other hand, favor the creation of pools in each district formed upon the lines of other successful business arrangements of like character.

The association as a whole will then confine itself to legitimate business of acquiring work and promoting the resources of members for doing work, leaving to the separate pools the business of dividing up that work at good prices.

TO THROW ALL RESOURCES ON PROJECTS.

We count in this association the membership and influence of every man engaged in the business; each one has something of value to us in the way of ideas, talent, energy, or influence, and it is the work of the association and its proper object and function to use these various factors for the benefit of the whole membership, and to throw upon any desired point the full resources of the association. In this way and by turning its steps in the right direction and with the full confidence and cooperation which it would then have from all its members, there no longer being any grounds for contention or rivalry amongst one another, when once this department of allotment was abandoned, the association will once more resume its proper place and perform many duties of the highest use and importance to its members.

The cost of its work would be distributed, and no member would have any cause for regretting that he was enrolled in its ranks.

If these views meet with your approval, your board would earnestly urge that, at least for a time, the district commission and all rules pertaining thereto be abrogated and discontinued; that the Loard of directors be instructed to arrange and appoint a series of committees, chosen of their own ranks, as well as from the entire membership, giving to each committee certain specified duties, which will include all matters which it is to the interest of the association to have promoted and studied. These committees should report from time to time to the board of directors, and the latter, being a representative body from all parts of the coast, would be most efficient in taking up and promoting all suggestions and measures requiring action.

No expense should be incurred by the committees, except as specially authorized by the directors from time to time and in cases where the necessity for such expenditures is apparent.

The board should organize a bureau of information, which would furnish to each member at regular intervals a synopsis of what is going on in the way of dredging operations on the coast, improvements in machinery or methods of doing work, with descriptions of such improvements, locations, etc., and the general work being done by and through committees and in the board of directors; this and such other additional information as may suggest itself.

This bureau should be in charge of a competent man, whose business is to procure and intelligently transmit matters of interest.

The question of insurance has never been adequately considered, and some measure should be taken up and carefully considered, so that a general scheme of insurance could be devised to secure some reduction of the large premium now paid by members to the insurance companies. Very little, if any, work of this kind has been done in our business, and it is believed that a system of employment of representative agents for our insurance would be found profitable and a great saving.

DREDGERS NEGLECTED THE PORK BARREL.

The lack of association methods and the failure to use the means in our hands for the general good was forcibly illustrated recently in the river and harbor bill, where absolutely no effort was made by the association to procure any amendment to the bill or any provision inserted therein for its benefit.

It also appears in the case recently of certain collisions which occurred in the Savannah River, where the law at present provides that a dredge occupying a channel in navigable waters is doing so at its peril, and no damages resulting to the said dredge can be recovered. These and a great many instances could be cited to show the neglect that general interest of dredging men is receiving at this time and emphasizes the necessity for proper action by the association, to wit, such as this one was intended to be and should be.

Your board of directors desire to assure this association and its members that they have devoted their best efforts, during the year just ended, to a consideration of all matters affecting the interests and business of those for whom they have acted. They have appreciated that the duties which they assumed in accepting the offices of directors required them to give the necessary time to consideration of the matters intrusted to them, and they looked over the entire field of cooperative work, and have determined that the association could be made of great value to the members if conducted on the lines heretofore specified.

They are also of the opinion that the work which the association has been attempting to do, namely, the allotment of work among members, has been entirely contrary to the spirit of this organization, and has proven a stumbling block in all its efforts to promote the general interests of its members. We feel that by means of thorough reforms in our methods, such as has been outlined, that the organization will rapidly add to its membership, and soon include all the operators on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; that there will no longer be any reason why anyone engaged in the business should not join with us in our efforts to promote the business and encourage the giving of work by those having it in their power to do so, as well as the many other features which have been touched upon in this our report.

The board have held meetings on the second Wednesday of every month except the months of July and August, during which latter months the constitution provides a recess shall be taken, and the meetings have been well attended.

BOARD IS TO WORK FOR PORK BARRELS.

Your board feels regret that the river and harbor bill has failed of passage, and considers it all the more important that the association should be organized for the purpose of adding its influence to urging work by municipal organizations and bodies, and doing all in their power to create offerings of work in the various ports of entry and harbors. It is only by persistent effort that the loss entailed upon us by the failure of the harbor bill can in any way be compensated for. Your board further wishes to emphasize their regret that the annual banquet of the association has been allowed to go by default for two or three years. These entertainments do not entail any serious expense upon the association, but they do create the greatest possible prestige for our business in the estimation of those whose favor it is to our advantage to gain. Influential public men and men of business affairs having to do with transportation companies and steamship lines are entertained by us on these occasions with the greatest possible benefit to our business—municipal officers, heads of departments, Members of Congress and of legislatures—and their favor and interest is legitimately gained and has been found to be of the greatest value when circumstances required it. The expense of our entertainment is wisely expended, and brings an adequate return for every dollar so spent.

We might also add that the occasion also affords an opportunity for members to meet on holiday terms, and encourages in every way good fellowship and kindly feelings among them. It is therefore to be hoped that in another year this banquet will be again a feature of the association.

The work of the association has been so largely confined to the burdensome details of allotment and district commission work during the past year that very little of general interest has developed.

We have done the best we could with the allotment problem, and have done even better than an association of this kind could have been expected to do; but we hope that the whole matter will be relegated to other agencies, and the efforts of this association left untrammeled for the coming year to perform the duties for which it is properly fitted.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Dated New York, March 13, 1901.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS,
By FRANK A. FURST, President.

SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
New York City, April 25, 1901.

DEAR SIR: The Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association cordially tender to you an invitation to join them in their work of promoting the interests of dredging men upon the Atlantic coast.

It has been the object of this association during the 18 years of existence to provide a means of acquaintance and intercourse amongst men engaged in the same kind of business, to promote good fellowship amongst them, and encourage all movements that will provide work and stimulate large undertakings in the improvement of waterways.

The association has been of great assistance to its members in these respects, and is the only organization existing among dredging operators having these objects in view. By assembling together operators from all points on the coast the combined talent, energy, resources, and influence of the various members, coupled with the long experience of the association, is placed at the disposal of the members for the ultimate benefit of each, and for the promotion of measures for their interest.

The association further aims at promoting social intercourse between operators and customers and influential men by its annual banquets, and with great success in the past. It does not hinder or control any operator in his business or in the prices he may obtain for his work, but leaves all individual matters of that character to the members themselves, without interference, seeking to advance the interests of each member through general features which build up and improve the general business in which all are engaged, and where these matters can be fully discussed and acted upon when necessary.

Your consideration is therefore cordially requested and your application for membership will be met with the fullest explanation of our work. The expense of membership is reasonable.

Hoping to hear from you, I am,

Very truly, yours,

JOHN F. CLARK,
Clerk of the Board.

By order of the board.

Mr. Speaker, if the report I have presented is authentic, and such an organization as this exists, having for its purpose the advancement of "pork barrels" through Congress for the mutual interest and benefit of its members, it is time that an investigation of such secret influences was had.

As bearing upon this proposition I offer for consideration a short clipping which purports to have been taken from the Atlantic Deep Waterways Bulletin of 1915:

THE PRESIDENT GETS A GOOD JOB.

Frank A Furst, president of the Maryland Dredging Co., was one of the principal figures at the annual meeting of the Dredge Owners' Protective Association, of which he is president, held in New York last month.

Mr. Furst's company is digging the canal across Cape Cod, which is a link in the chain of waterways along the Atlantic coast. In addition the Maryland Dredging Co. is draining the Everglades of Florida. Mr. Furst spoke of both of these projects before the association, and told some very interesting stories in connection with the difficulties encountered in the Everglades project.

Will it be reasonably questioned that a committee might get at some interesting facts regarding influences behind "pork barrels" if possessed of authority to subpœna witnesses for that purpose? It must be admitted that sufficient information has been offered on which to base proceedings, and there is more that can be furnished when the committee reports out my resolution for investigation and provides the machinery for its conduct.

Hereafter, in its proper place, I will connect up the dredgers' organization with kindred spirits; but I wish to precede such action by disclosing certain other activities in favor of the 1914 pork barrel which are hand in glove with the dredgers. They were exposed in the Senate on September 19 by Senator KENYON, who quoted from a back-fire reaching into my own district. He said:

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress has been a pretty busy institution in creating the same kind of sentiment; and it does seem to me that associations that are trying to create sentiment to influence Members of Congress are coming very near the lobby proposition. Some time ago, on July 27, 1914, they sent out a letter from Washington which I shall ask to insert in the RECORD and only read portions of it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Chair. The letter is as follows:

THE BACK FIRE IN WISCONSIN.

NATIONAL RIVERS AND HARBORS CONGRESS,
Washington Office, July 27, 1914.

GENTLEMEN: One of the most violent attacks, if not the most violent, that has ever been made upon the policy of improving our national waterways has for some time been in progress in the Senate of the United States, supported by a portion of the daily press and certain periodicals of wide circulation.

Since 1910, when the policy of annual, instead of triennial, river and harbor bills was adopted, the estimates submitted by the Army engineers call only for the amount which can probably be expended during the succeeding fiscal year. To provide for continuous work on projects already under way, the pending bill should have been passed before July 1; and already, because of exhaustion of funds, work has been suspended on a number of improvements, and with every day of delay in the passage of the bill the number of suspensions will increase.

But that is not the worst of the situation. For many reasons Senators are anxious to get away from Washington; other legislation of great importance, and concerning which there is a wide difference of opinion, is yet to be considered. The river and harbor bill has had no right of way; it has received only brief and occasional consideration, and has now been definitely displaced by the trust-regulation bills, and can receive no further consideration until these have been finally disposed of. The rules of the Senate allow any Senator to speak on any subject to the limit of his endurance. In 1901 Senator Carter, unaided, talked a river and harbor bill to death. Several Senators are cooperating in the present attack. Some of them have stated directly that they consider the bill so bad that it ought to be defeated, and the tactics which have been pursued thus far look very much like a filibuster.

Out of about 350 waterway projects, only 15 are under the continuing-contract system. On all the rest, if the pending bill fails of passage, work must be stopped for at least a year; costly machinery will rust in idleness; efficient working forces built up during the past four years will be disorganized and scattered; uncompleted work will be damaged or destroyed; investments in terminals will be rendered unproductive; the movement, well under way in many parts of the country, for the restoration of navigation on our inland waterways will receive a serious check; the deepening of our ocean harbors will be delayed, while our foreign competitors take the cream of the benefits of the Panama Canal, and the railways will retain their monopoly of transportation for at least another year, meantime redoubling their efforts to retain it for all time by preventing the completion of a national system of connected waterways and harbors.

MATHEMATICAL ACCURACY OF AN ARMY ENGINEER.

Along with the charge that this bill is "the most vicious and vulnerable" that has ever been framed must be considered the statement of Gen Kingman, the Chief of Engineers, "My judgment is that there is less than one-half of 1 per cent of 'pork' in the river and harbor bill now pending in the Senate," and the assertions of Senators SIMMONS, SMITH of Michigan, and RANSDELL—all members of the Commerce Committee and of the subcommittee which devoted weeks of conscientious study to the framing of the bill—who have stated on the floor of the Senate that it does not include a single item which is not fully justified and that there is not one cent's worth of "pork" in it.

One of the enemies of the bill has intimated that it is highly improper for the people of a community to seek to promote the improvement of the waterways or harbors in which they are particularly interested or for a national organization with an office in Washington to request that any letters or telegrams shall be sent to Senators or Representatives regarding pending legislation.

Nevertheless I consider it my duty to inform you that unless the friends of waterways bestir themselves the bill is likely to fail, because after a month or more of debate on the trust-regulation bills through the heat of a Washington summer Senators will be so worn out that it will be very hard to keep a quorum present to consider other legislation, no matter how important it may be.

In the opinion of the writer the failure of the river and harbor bill would be nothing short of a national disaster. Whether you will take any steps to avert this threatened disaster is a matter which must be left for you to decide.

Very truly, yours, S. A. THOMPSON, Secretary.

This is sent to a lumber company in Wisconsin.

THE BACK-FIRE IN IOWA.

Senator KENYON continues:

From my own State I am in receipt of a newspaper setting forth some of the correspondence received by the mayor of this city on the river from Mr. Thompson, secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. In that letter "the mayor is urged to use his influence in keeping the Iowa Congressmen and Senators at Washington in order that a quorum may be had up to the final hour of adjournment. If a quorum of the Members of Congress can be maintained, it is contended that the bill can readily be enacted into law. With Muscatine on the Mississippi River, the following appeal addressed to Mayor Kern should be of interest locally."

This very interesting document refers to the question of Senator PENROSE to the Democratic leader, Senator KERN, as to the passage of a river and harbor bill; and the answer of the Senator from Indiana apparently did not satisfy this distinguished secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, because he says in this letter:

"You will note that the agreement was not that the bill should be passed, but that it should be disposed of, which is a very different matter. It is very evident that the group of Senators who have been conducting the filibuster against the bill intend to continue their opposition. And in private conversation Senator KERN strongly emphasized the statement that has already been repeatedly made from this office, viz:

"The passage of the river and harbor bill depends absolutely upon the maintenance of a quorum both in the Senate and the House."

I do not assume that this gentleman had any authority to speak for the Senator from Indiana. He says:

"Do not make the mistake of supposing that the House has nothing more to do with the matter. Many amendments have been made to the bill as passed by the House, which makes it necessary that the bill, when passed by the Senate, shall be sent to conference, and the report of the conference committee must receive an affirmative vote, both in the House and the Senate, before the bill will be finally passed.

"Weariness from the almost continuous sessions during the past two years"—no reference is made here to the weariness of night sessions—"the near approach of the fall campaign"—that was in July—"and many other reasons make it entirely natural that Senators and Members should be anxious to leave Washington as soon as the trust bills and emergency legislation made necessary by the war in Europe shall be disposed of. Nothing but the pressure of public opinion will insure the maintenance of a quorum until the river and harbor bill is passed."

We are going to bring a pressure now, not of public opinion but against public opinion, to bring the Senators here under the order by means of special sergeants at arms, under reasonable compensation, I assume.

"That pressure must be exerted and the quorum maintained, for the failure of the bill would be nothing short of a national disaster.

* * * * * * *

LOOK OUT FOR THE SHORT SESSION.

"Thus far those who have conducted the filibuster have made only general charges instead of specific criticisms. They and certain newspapers and periodicals which have approved their course seem to want not to eliminate objectionable items, but to defeat the bill as a whole. It should be remembered that it is ten times as easy to defeat a bill at the short session of Congress as at the long session. If the bill of 1914 is defeated, there is little hope for one next year.

"Petitions, memorials, and resolutions adopted by commercial organizations are all effective means of influencing Senators and Representatives, but the most effective method is a flood of genuinely personal letters and telegrams from their constituents. Duplicated letters and telegrams in identical language will not answer—in fact, do harm rather than good—but no Member of either the House or the Senate will fail to heed hundreds or thousands of letters and telegrams which are evidently written by those whose names are signed thereto."

THE OREGON BACK-FIRE.

This is one of the wisest diplomats that this association has in its service that it ever has been my pleasure to observe.

Now, that is not all; and I want to make my case against this method of affecting public sentiment, in view of this criticism here.

Out in Astoria their paper, the Daily Budget, of September 1, 1914—which has been blue-penciled and sent, I suppose, to most Members of Congress—contains "the pleasing language with which Capt. Wilson I. Davenny, field secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, described his impressions at the rooms of the Port of Columbia Commercial Club. The meeting was under the auspices of the Columbia and Snake River Waterways Association, which was joined by every commercial organization in the city."

This distinguished representative, who was engaged in the business of creating public sentiment, said to these people, among other things, this—and I will read only a very short portion of it:

"You people have a laudable ambition. Everywhere I have been today I hear your demand for nothing less than 40 feet in the channel across the shoal at the mouth of the river. Such an object is a commendable one, and when accomplished will place you on the great international highway of commerce. It is an ambition that looks big for a little community like this, when one considers that New York, with all her wealth and influence, has been working for years on a similar project, and to-day there is only that amount of water in the Ambrose Channel. But you can attain your goal if you but persist, and the Rivers and Harbors Congress will help you, as it is through that body you have a means of reaching the legislative branch of the Government, with the backing of the representative interests of the entire Nation.

"The improvement of river channels"—

Says this field agent—

"and of harbors does not come by accident, but in accordance with a well-defined and studied plan. The Rivers and Harbors Congress is the center around which that plan is worked out. It is an organization of the live ones of the country, who realize the importance of improving our means of transportation and lowering its cost."

And in the letters which they send out they have a motto, "Second only in importance to the Congress of the United States."

"The result thus far has been the passing of four annual appropriation bills, not including the one which is now pending. It is strange how few people understand the problem of transportation and the portion of its cost which each must pay, as well as the bearing which our waterways have upon it. Transportation cost is a concealed tax, and every commodity must stand its portion. Search the world over and you find the cities which are the centers of activities are those located adjacent to bodies of navigable waters. With due deference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it may be fairly said that improved waterways are the best regulators of transportation rates."

Then the distinguished gentleman proceeds to consider that to some extent, and says:

"The passage of the rivers and harbors measure is one which concerns the commercial welfare of the entire country. It is not one based on selfish motives, but for fostering the industrial development of the land. Any Congressman, any Senator, or any newspaper which opposes it is an enemy to your advancement."

Here was the great argument that this gentleman presented; but that kind of argument does not always carry weight with some Oregonians.

"The bill gives to Oregon in cash and commitments one-eighth of the full sum to be appropriated. Why, then, should anyone here oppose it?"

True; why should they? Why should anyone in any State, receiving any part of the money for use in that State, oppose great appropriation measures? That is the vice of the whole thing. That is the kind of public sentiment that this particular institution seems to be unconsciously building up.

WHERE DOES THE MONEY COME FROM?

Now, where does the money come from to carry on this great propaganda throughout this country? Why should it be necessary for large sums of money to be collected and spent in giving dredgers' association banquets to influential citizens, as I have read here from their statements? I do not want to neglect to read the condemnation of that from the New York Waterway Association, which seems to have a different conception of affairs. I want to use and get into the record in this case, which I am trying to preserve for appeal to what I consider a higher court—the court of the people of this country, who are going to pass on this question eventually—a letter which I am authorized to use, to Congressman FREAR, of Wisconsin, who fought this river and harbor bill in the House almost unassisted and alone, actuated by a public spirit that seldom has been witnessed in the Halls of the American Congress. This letter is from Mr. Richard M. McCann, the publisher of Waterways and Commerce, a monthly magazine devoted to restoration of the American merchant marine and the establishment of world peace. In it he says:

"I inclose herewith original subscription lists obtained from a canvasser named Mr. John M. Williams, of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, who received 50 per cent for obtaining the amounts set opposite each name. As you will see, the subscriptions cover 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912."

WHERE THE MONEY GOES.

Here is a canvasser—if this authority is correct, and I assume it is—who is collecting money to be used in creating public sentiment and receiving 50 per cent of what he collects; and these letters are going out, criticizing Members of Congress for the stand they may take as to this river and harbor bill, and paying the expenses of field representatives who go out and make their speeches and urge the passage of the measure.

We find that in 1910 the subscribers were the following:

THE OHIO BACK-FIRE.

Continuing his exposure of the secret back fire behind the pork barrel, Senator KENYON said:

Then I want to call attention to a letter along this same line of influence, and it is one of threats with relation to this river and harbor bill. This is a letter to Senator BURTON from the G. H. Williams Co., E. P. Lord, secretary, of Cleveland, Ohio, and I am going to read it, because I want it in the RECORD:

"CLEVELAND, OHIO, September 10, 1914.

"Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: As manufacturers of special machinery used very largely by river and harbor contractors and United States engineers doing that class of work, we desire to express the wish that the opposition to the passage of the rivers and harbors bill now before the Senate be so modified or withdrawn that the full passage of the bill may be assured at the earliest moment.

"It seems to us that the manufacturers of the country at large are suffering sufficiently through the general depression and lack of business of all kinds, and that there should be nothing done by the Government that would add to the troubles we already have.

"A very large volume of our business comes from the contractors who are working on dam contracts along the rivers, and also by United States engineers on river and harbor work in all sections of the country. We have quite recently been following up our previous orders from these various sources to obtain some expression as to when we might anticipate further business, and in every case thus far we have received one and the same reply, and that is that all construction work in their district has been suspended on account of the failure of Congress to pass the rivers and harbors bill and that they would not be in the market for clamshell buckets or other material in our line until this bill passed; and from the extreme South, where we do considerable business, they go so far as to say that all field operations have practically ceased in that section for lack of funds; thousands of men are lying idle, and the contractors express their determination that they will never buy anything made in Ohio owing to the fact that our Senators are strenuously opposing the rivers and harbors bill."

So here comes this insidious influence working around through boycott channels to try to stop Senators who may be honest from opposing this measure:

"From this particular class of business we have been receiving a very large bulk and volume of our trade and which now is absolutely flat. We do not have one order on our books, and the necessity of closing down our plant stares us in the face; and if this harbors and rivers bill is not passed and all the vast amount of work of this kind is cut off, and the large contractors, who are our best customers, are obliged to suspend operations, there will be no further business for us until a change takes place. We therefore ask your aid in seeing that this bill is passed, and that at as early a date as possible.

"Respectfully submitted.

"THE G. H. WILLIAMS CO.,
"E. P. LORD, Secretary."

THE BIG STICK USED IN OHIO.

At this point the Iowa Senator was interrupted in his reading by an Ohio Senator:

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Iowa has just read a letter which was written to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] by the G. H. Williams Co., of which E. P. Lord is secretary. I received, perhaps about the same day, identically the same letter. Here is an Ohio firm, I am ashamed to confess it, that writes to the Senators of that State asking them to stop all opposition to this bill, which involves the expenditure of about $53,000,000, for what reason? Because the bill is right? No. Because the items therein provided for are proper items of expenditure by the Government? No. But the single reason urged is that this firm of manufacturers, out of the $53,000,000 of expenditure from the Public Treasury, may be able to get orders for a few clamshell buckets, and they are inspired to write this letter because, they say, there are some contractors in the South who are interested in this measure.

I am not holding the South responsible for this. I am not going to question the high purposes that lie back of the authorship of most of the items in this bill. Most of these items, so far as I am familiar with reference to this bill by the contents of this letter. It is so contain manufacturers and contractors attempting to influence public servants in the performance of their duty, and, in substance, asking them to disregard their sworn oaths, language fails me in my effort to either describe the letter or the writer of it, even if he is from my State, or the southern contractors whose correspondence seems to have inspired it. Judging their moral and civic character by this letter, they must, to say the least, be lacking in a proper conception of public duty.

Mr. KENYON. The letter the Senator has is identical, I assume, with the one I read.

Mr. POMERENE. I understood from my colleague that he had such a letter, and while the Senator from Iowa was reading it I compared the one I have in my hand with it. It is identically the same.

I am not going to be deterred in the position I shall hereafter take with reference to this bill by the contents of this letter. Is is so contemptible in its spirit that it deserves to be treated with silence. There have been other matters that have come to my attention. I have been waited upon and told that this bill was right in all respects, and that I should vote for it as it is. I am not in the habit of accepting dictation from men who come to me in that spirit. I recognize that it is a very great honor to represent the great State of Ohio on the floor of this Chamber, but I am more honored by the opposition of men who can write a letter of this kind than I can be honored by a seat in this Chamber.

The evidence introduced by Senator KENYON includes letters written to Wisconsin and to Iowa by the secretary of the Rivers and Harbors Congress on the pork barrel. The contents speak for themselves.

In the Astoria paper of September 1, quoted by Senator KENYON, it was set forth in a half page article that Capt. Wilson I. Davenny, field agent of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, was on hand at a waterway meeting urging that Senators be kept on the job until the pork-barrel bill could be passed, and a strong resolution was thereupon passed by the association urging Oregon Senators to support the pork barrel and not adjourn until the task was finished.

In the correspondence of Secretary Thompson the records will undoubtedly show that the G. H. Williams Co., of Cleveland, was given to understand that an impending "disaster is threatened," and the Williams Co. out in Cleveland demands that "opposition to the passage of the rivers and harbors bill now before the Senate be so modified or withdrawn that the full passage of the bill may be assured at the earliest possible moment."

It is significant that both Ohio Senators received a copy of the demand, indicating that the same influence exerted in Oregon was working in Ohio, and all under the direction of the Rivers and Harbors Congress officials, who were in Washington directing a campaign in favor of the bill. What wonder that the Senator from Ohio, who had taken no part in the debate, should rise in his place on the floor of the Senate to express his indignation at the general tenor of the letter and at other agencies that were active in pressing the bill.

These activities in the press, through letters, and by traveling agents are of such character that they invite the attention of a Federal Congress that is to be relieved from intelligent consideration of a $50,000,000 annual pork barrel after it has once been prepared by the officials of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, who style themselves "second only in importance to the Congress of the United States."

THE MISSISSIPPI LAND RECLAMATION BIG STICK.

An interesting phase of waterway activities is afforded by loud protests against swinging of a big stick wielded by the lower Mississippi River land reclamationists. This charge does not come from irresponsible sources, but from an association presided over by one of the ablest Members upon this floor and one of the most vigorous champions of the intracoastal system, Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, of Philadelphia. The association supports a monthly journal devoted to waterways. In a recent number, published in February, 1914, the following vigorous protest speaks volumes for the effective work now being secretly carried on for the $60,000,000 Humphreys-Ransdell bill. It reads as follows:

Business men in the Eastern States may not realize the systematic campaign which is being waged from points in the Mississippi Valley to dragoon everyone into the ranks for an unprecedently large and continuing appropriation for the Mississippi River. Some of these letters amount practically to threats of transfer of business unless eastern houses fall in line and go on record with their Congressmen in favor of the project. Without present discussion of the merits of the bill, and for obvious reasons omitting names, the following letter sent us by an eastern correspondent is herewith reproduced as a matter of information:

"GENTLEMEN: Will not your firm kindly aid in the matter of securing national legislation such as will prevent a recurrence of the disastrous floods of 1912 and 1913 on the lower Mississippi River?

"A measure known as the Ransdell-Humphreys bill, providing for the expenditure of $60,000,000 by the National Government to complete the levee system during the next five years, and thereby prevent these disastrous floods, is now before Congress.

"This measure was framed in accordance with the plans and recommendations of the Army engineers and provides the only practicable and feasible means of solving the problem.

"The people of the region affected have already contributed $70,000,000, and it is considered but right that the Nation contribute its share toward controlling the flood waters from so great a part of the country on a stream of such national magnitude.

"Letters from your firm asking the delegation from your State to support the measure in Congress will help us very greatly; and, as our loss is your loss and our prosperity your prosperity, we hope that you will feel a personal interest in the matter."

CONGRESSMEN MUST FAIRLY DIVIDE "PORK."

"For ways that are dark" this threatening campaign is original. "Our loss is your loss and our prosperity is your prosperity." Was this a reference to mutual claims upon the pork barrel, or did it mean that southern business houses were about to secede from northern connections unless the Pennsylvania Congressmen came across with their support?

The Waterways Journal, from the City of Brotherly Love, understands it to be the demand of a legislative highwayman organization, and it protests against this unprofessional campaign carried on by the Ransdell-Humphreys bill. With the ethical standards of either organization we are not concerned, but what other interesting leads might be developed by an investigation of the $150,000 promotion fund or the wielding of a big stick whereby hesitating Congressmen are forced to join in an irresistible political push on the pork barrel.

A NEW YORK CANAL BIG STICK.

The Mississippi River incident occurred in February, before the river and harbor bill was made up and presented to the House. Thereafter it passed the House, and when introduced in the Senate it contained $9,000,000 for the lower Mississippi and also generous appropriations for the intracoastal system. The bill was riddled in the Senate by the ablest waterway expert in the country and by other able men and then defeated through the aid of an independent press.

The $20,000,000 substitute is now before the House and the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia, Mr. MOORE, editor of the journal that so properly resented intimidation from lower Mississippi River sources, has just stated, amidst applause:

Sitting in 25-story skyscrapers in New York, we have seen great editors writing editorials approving the filibusters and giving out sensational statements to all the people that because of a "pork barrel" a rivers and harbors bill should not pass. [Applause.] The people of the Hudson Valley set some fires under those editorial offices, they set some fires under the magazine writers, and I question whether they will be quite so conspicuous hereafter in cutting out their own appropriations in New York and up the Hudson as they have been heretofore.

And so, Mr. Speaker, the New York papers and the New York magazines have been muzzled, and through self-interest in the pork barrel will hereafter remain mum over the $50,000,000 "humbug and steal," as it was termed by Senator TILLMAN when it did not reach one-half of its present proportions.

MUZZLING THE PRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

I realize the power that exists behind the "pork barrel," a power that impels Members to remain silent and support the measure; but when that power reaches out and controls the press of the land by methods as dangerous and far-reaching as those employed by Louisiana land reclamationists on Pennsylvania business men, then it is time for the country to revolt.

In Philadelphia was once written an immortal document that declared this people to be free and independent. That spirit is still found in Philadelphia, as I propose to show.

At the First Congress of the United States, held in 1789 in New York City, there was adopted the first amendment to the Federal Constitution, which read:

Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

A power denied to Congress is proposed now to be exercised by secret influences in order to pass $50,000,000 "pork barrels." Whether the New York newspapers or magazines can be smothered remains to be seen, but I quote from the shadows of Independence Hall a brief editorial published in the Philadelphia Inquirer a few days ago. This utterance from a great newspaper indicates that the smothering process did not begin in Philadelphia. The Philadelphia Inquirer said editorially on September 16:

Gaily the debate over the thieves bill, politely known as the rivers and harbors appropriations, goes on in the Senate. Having cut out appropriations of genuine merit to serve the interests of southern statesmen, it is interesting to watch the antics of our southern friends in their efforts to defend the great steal. * * * The South is in the saddle sure enough.

The Chicago Tribune of September 10 says:

If the rivers and harbors appropriations were 50 per cent pure, they would be opposed by uncompromising Congressmen determined that filching should not have recognized place in the process of Government. Until the question of internal improvement can be taken up honestly by Congress these bills ought to be opposed.

I could quote from the Washington Times, New York Sun, the Press, the Times, the Philadelphia Press, Cleveland Plain Dealer, and innumerable papers that ask Congress to swat the barrel.

Collier's National Magazine, La Follette's, Pierson's, Chappel's, World's Work, Saturday Evening Post, Harper's, and other periodicals have had strong editorial utterances on the subject. Are all these newspapers and magazines to be silenced? I do not believe so.

A WAR CRY FOR $50,000,000 ANNUAL LOOT.

In order that we may fully understand the purposes of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress which, according to its field secretary, Mr. Davenny, is a "body through which you have a means of reaching the legislative branch of the Government," I quote the first provision of its constitution affecting its purposes:

ART. II. Objects: The objects of this congress shall be the collection, preparation, and presentation to the Congress of the United States of such statistics and other information bearing upon the question of improvment of rivers and harbors of all the Nation as will secure for such purpose an annual appropriation by the said Congress of not less than $50,000,000.

This remarkable provision that commits all the members of this "second congress" to an annual $50,000,000 loot of the Federal Treasury, irrespective of character or merit of projects, is the tie which binds.

No more scandalous proposition was ever advanced by any organization in the history of the country.

If the Army officers or Navy officers organized to secure a specific fund from the Federal Treasury every year, there would be vacancies in the Army and Navy that could not be credited to the plucking board.

If any general or admiral was president of such board and directed his paid agents to organize a back-fire whereby the Federal Congress would be compelled to pass a "pork barrel" a large part of which was waste, if such a thing could happen, what floods of patriotic oratory would overflow the pages of the RECORD. How Members would properly resent such public or secret interference.

The Rivers and Harbors Congress is a benevolent organization that demanded over $53,000,000 in 1914 in addition to $6,990,000 previously covered by the sundry civil bill, and of that $53,000,000 the sum of $10,500,000 was to go into a river that had lost 80 per cent of its traffic within the past score of years, and of that amount six-sevenths, or $9,000,000, was to be expended on the lower Mississippi River on what competent engineers already quoted, term a "land-reclamation scheme."

A PRESIDENT'S BATTLE CRY.

In his annual address before a recent convention of the congress, its distinguished president and a national legislator of renown, who presides over this second congress, made the following strange prophecy in 1911 when announcing his battle cry to Congress:

Dense ignorance as to the benefits of water transportation exists in many quarters. Congress is committed to an annual river and harbor bill only by the precedent of the past two years. Thirty millions a year is a great advance over twenty millions, but it is still far below our battle cry of "fifty millions per annum." Nor can our fondest enthusiast say that we have fully established the wise, definite waterway policy we set out to secure. In spite of our great success, much remains to be done. But the coveted goal is almost in sight. Let us struggle hard for a few years longer and victory will be sure to crown our efforts.

[Applause.]

Reharking back to a prior "congress," I find the same distinguished president and national legislator recorded as saying to his congress:

I am glad to see so many Members of the American Congress in this hall. These Senators and Representatives are here to receive instructions from you. They are your servants and will do what you wish. [Applause.]

Mind you, gentlemen of the American Congress, you are awaiting instructions from this $50,000,000 annual river congress, that supports no project, but a barrel.

COL. FOX GIVES CONGRESS ITS INSTRUCTIONS.

In the same proceedings Special Director Col. John A. Fox took part. Col. Fox is the publicity agent, mentioned in my remarks of June 19, and the man who compelled the railroads to give down. He has also been active in trying to get Mr. Rockefeller interested during a search for funds, as I will later show.

Col. Fox, with commendable modesty, tells what he intends the Congress of the United States shall do. He sees our duty, and with the aid of his "second congress" will look after its performance. He says in the 1911 report:

Gentlemen, we must not simply meet here and pass resolutions, adjourn, and go home, but we must see to it that the Congressman from every district in the United States understands the problem from a national viewpoint, sees it not from his local district's point of view, but from the point of view of a great national problem. We will see to it that he votes that the $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 that are needed every year toward completing this great work shall be appropriated.

SECRETARY ELLISON'S LEGISLATIVE STANDARDS.

A speech by a third officer of this second congress, delivered on the same occasion, is of special interest. We will again meet Capt. Ellison, the secretary and treasurer of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, but he has given the Members of the Federal Congress a new freedom of action, governed only by ability to get each one's share of loot. It is a novel amendment to the oath of office to which Congressmen subscribe. Mr. Ellison says in his annual speech:

I want to repeat and to emphasize that in supporting the National Rivers and Harbors Congress you are supporting your own cause. Another thing, be big and broad enough to demand that the improvements which are well underway, whether or not they happen to be your own particular projects, shall be put under the continuing-contract system and be taken off the appropriation map. The sooner that is done the sooner your own will receive its just recognition. * * * Mark you, it is not my intention to criticize either Congress or Congressmen for lack of business methods, for I truly believe the average man who comes to Washington is just as good a business man as the average man he has left at home. It is not his fault, as I see it, but our fault, and I use the word "our" in a nation-wide sense. We send him here to legislate for the Nation, theoretically, but actually to get all he can for us; and if he does not get our share, and then some, we do our best to replace him with some other man, who will take better care of our particular congressional district.

What think you, gentlemen of the Sixty-third Congress, of these standards of legislative ethics to which the second congress subscribes through the pronouncements of its officers? Get all you can from the Federal Treasury, for by the amount of boodle you bring home will you be known. If you do not get your share of the annual $50,000,000 loot, then you will be replaced, because twentieth century legislative morals have radically changed from those promulgated by the founders of the Federal Constitution.

PROJECTS DISTRIBUTED ACCORDING TO CONTRIBUTIONS.

One of the cardinal principles of this Rivers and Harbors Congress is that "nothing given, nothing got." By paying 1 per cent of Federal appropriations to the support of the Rivers and Harbors Congress every community can feel it has the supporting arm of Mr. Fox, Mr. Ellison, Mr. Thompson, Mr. Davenny, and other officials of this second congress. On pages 60 to 62 of the 1911 report appears a list of appropriations given to the different States of the Union amounting, in all, to $178,616,897 from 1907 to 1911, inclusive.

In two columns the members of the second congress are impressed with the relation between that body and the amount of Government appropriations for each separate State. I quote literally from the listed method of comparison and cite a dozen States or more to show the proportionate grabs that are held out invitingly to gaze by the Rivers and Harbors Congress officials.

	Amounts subscribed to the support of National Rivers and Harbors Congress, by States, 1906–1911, inclusive.	Amount of appropriations received by States, in rivers and harbors bill, 1907–1911, inclusive.
Pennsylvania (east)	$4,295	$4,837,745
Connecticut	2,115	2,318,000
Massachusetts	2,850	1,451,733
Maryland	1,755	2,778,265
New Jersey	2,735	3,484,895
North Carolina	2,538	2,259,614
South Carolina	1,137	1,237,290
Virginia	4,306	4,082,454
Georgia	8,281	4,102,889
Florida	1,620	5,188,670
District of Columbia	1,530	1,243,000
Alabama	6,090	6,952,000
Louisiana	9,505	3,820,292
Texas	8,825	9,193,309
Mississippi River	.....	21,842,775

Mississippi River (1914), $10,500,000, or nearly one-half of the six years' total.

DISTRIBUTING THE PORK.

New York and Florida receive more than the average State, excepting that the Mississippi River lump sum would swell the adjacent States over $21,000,000, if counted. Florida has many small waterways, like the Kissimmee and the Oklawaha, and is the home of influential Members at both ends of the Capitol, who determine the fortunes of the annual river and harbor bill.

Doubtless it appeals to lay members to realize that by the investment of $1 in the second congress $100 will be forthcoming from the Federal Congress. It is in harmony with the views of Secretary Ellison and of the purposes set forth so eloquently by the constitution.

To become entitled to the generous Federal appropriations I have presented as a harvest for a 1 per cent investment, the following rates for annual dues are provided for membership in the "National Rivers and Harbors Congress of the United States," as it is styled by its officers:

	Annual dues.
Individuals	$5
Firms or corporations	10
Organizations of less than 400	25
Organizations over 400 and less than 600	50
Organizations of 600 to 1,000	75
Organizations of 1,000 or more	100
Waterway associations	100

A system of graduated contributions for which graduated appropriations are in effect assured.

The report contains many interesting items, among which is Mr. Ellison's treasurer statement to members that receipts by him for the second congress from December 1, 1910, to November 30, 1911, coming from 171 cities, amounted to $34,756.25. As this modest amount does not correspond with other statements in my hands, I believe it will serve a laudable purpose for me to insert in the record some contributions made to this remarkable organization from among the thousands of individuals living in the 171 cities. Just how this money is being expended is not disclosed, but a few discrepancies in amounts will be referred to, and in some of the cases I hold in my hands what purports to be original subscription lists, from which I will quote.

I next introduce a letter which may throw an interesting light upon contributions and be of service to contributors who meet Mr. Williams in his future travels.

WATERWAYS AND COMMERCE,
No. 150 Nassau Street.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN FREAR:

* * * * * * *

I inclose herewith original subscription lists obtained from a canvasser named John M. Williams, of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, who received 50 per cent for the amount set opposite each name. As you will see, these subscriptions cover 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912.

You may regard them as your property to do as you please with them.

Sincerely, yours,

RICHARD M. MCCANN, Publisher.

I have knowledge of the information on which the foregoing statement is made, and believe it is correct as stated.

This certificate is introduced because it relates to the fortunes of Mr. Williams, whose activities will be briefly followed in connection with the Rivers and Harbors Congress and other waterway organizations:

STATE OF OHIO, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Columbus, November 26, 1909.

Mr. JOHN M. WILLIAMS,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to appoint you as one of the delegates from Ohio to attend the coming session of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress at Washington, D. C., December 8–10, 1909.

You are advised that there is no fund out of which the expenses of the delegates to this congress can be paid, but I feel that your interest in the purposes of the congress is such as to lead you to attend, if it is possible for you to do so.

Respectfully,

[SEAL.] JUDSON HARMON, Governor.

BALTIMORE'S CONTRIBUTIONS TO A CONGRESS.

As I am unable to secure a congressional investigation of the activities of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, I have digressed long enough to call attention to a copy of the proceedings of the eighth annual convention of the "congress second only in importance to the Congress of the United States," held at Washington December 6, 7, and 8, 1911. On pages 51 to 54 are given the total receipts from 171 cities from December 1, 1910, to November 30, 1911, inclusive, amounting to $34,756.25, as previously stated.

Referring to the total contributions received from Maryland during this period we find, on page 53, that Baltimore contributes $25 and Pocomoke City $5; total, $30.

This is the published statement given to the members of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, but I have in my hands what purports to be some original subscription lists, and it is significant that Mr. Furst's dredging company's subscription of $100 and others noted fail to appear in the statement submitted for 1911, although Pocomoke City, that eventually will receive a share of pork for its $5 offering, gets into print with its widow's mite.

BALTIMORE IS FIRST AMONG THE NEEDY.

Here follows a special plea for the Atlantic coast canal system, which at once must be improved. The plea reached the pocketbooks of dredgers, contractors, and others, as hereafter appears, following this pointed letter of introduction.

[National Rivers and Harbors Congress: JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, president, Washington, D. C., and Lake Providence, La.; J. F. Ellison, secretary and treasurer, Cincinnati, Ohio; John A. Fox, special director, Washington, D. C.]

WASHINGTON OFFICE, 1910.

To the business interests of Baltimore, Md.:

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress is working earnestly to secure the adoption by the Federal Government of a permanent waterway policy that will provide for improving all the worthy waterways of the Union

The improvement of the canals and waters of the Atlantic coast, in which Baltimore has such a direct and vital interest, should be among the first to receive the benefit of the increased and regular appropriations for rivers and harbors that this organization is working to bring about.

Funds are needed to carry on the work which the National Rivers and Harbors Congress has persistently urged, and to the end that a strong demand may come from every section of the Republic we earnestly invite your financial cooperation.

John M. Williams is authorized to receive and receipt for all moneys that may be subscribed. He is working under the direction of and reporting to the undersigned officers of the congress.

Very respectfully,

JOS. E. RANSDELL,
President.

P. S.—We earnestly urge the people of Baltimore to contribute to the support of this great work.

DAVID H. CARROLL,
Vice President.
JOHN R. SHERWOOD,
Director.

The foregoing presents our old friend, Mr. Williams, of 50 per cent collection-terms fame. That he was industrious the following statement shows.

Attached to the letter is the following evidence of appreciation:

DELAWARE RIVER IS ALSO FIRST AMONG THE NEEDY.

Here follows the pressing need of the Delaware River, which must have an appropriation at once, according to the Rivers and Harbors Congress. This brought a generous subscription from all ports on the Delaware, including something substantial from Philadelphia.

The letter reads:

[National Rivers and Harbors Congress, second in importance only to the Congress of the United States: JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, president, Washington, D. C., and Lake Providence, La.; J. F. Ellison, secretary and treasurer, Cincinnati, Ohio; John A. Fox, special director, Washington, D. C.]

WASHINGTON OFFICE, 1910.

To the business interests of Wilmington, Del.:

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress is working earnestly to secure the adoption by the Federal Government of a permanent waterway policy that will provide for improving all the worthy waterways of the Union.

The deepening of the Delaware River and the improvement of the canals and waterways of the Atlantic coast, in which Wilmington has such a direct and vital interest, should be among the first to receive the benefit of the increased and regular appropriations for rivers and harbors that this organization is working to bring about.

Funds are needed to carry on the work which the National Rivers and Harbors Congress has persistently urged, and to the end that a strong demand may come from every section of the Republic your financial cooperation is invited.

Very respectfully,

ANTHONY HIGGINS,
Delaware Director of National Congress of Rivers and Harbors.

The bearer of this letter, Mr. Williams, has been properly introduced, and it is desirable that those interested in improvement of the waterways by the National Government should contribute to this propaganda, and I urge upon all to do so as liberally as they can.

HORAN WILSON,
Vice President for Delaware.

It may be well not to overlook the fact that this recommendation is given to our old friend, Mr. Williams, who is alleged to have received 50 per cent of collections in other cases and who is aiding "this propaganda" to the best of his ability. A list of a few Philadelphia subscriptions follow. It is significant that it includes varied interests from transportation companies that are understood to favor the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal down to the Sugar Trust.

THE OHIO RIVER IS ALSO FIRST AMONG THE NEEDY.

Here is a declaration that the Ohio stands at the head and must at once be improved. The Rivers and Harbors Congress gets a generous offering through the instrumentality of Mr. Williams, who is again to the rescue.

ADVOCATES A POLICY, NOT A PROJECT.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, September, 1909.

To the business interests of Pittsburgh, Pa.:

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress in its work to secure legislation that will result in the adoption and putting into effect by the Federal Government of a permanent policy that will provide funds for the improvement of the waterways of the Nation, the worth of which has been demonstrated, solicits financial cooperation; this is necessary in order that the campaign of arousing throughout all parts of the United States a demand for such a policy may be carried on systematically and uninterruptedly.

The improvement of the Ohio River, which most directly concerns the commercial interests of Pittsburgh, now admittedly stands at the head of all rivers. It has been so placed by the United States Engineer Corps, working to bring about and will be the first to benefit from such appropriations.

The general agent of the organization, John M. Williams, is authorized to receive and receipt for all moneys that may be subscribed. He is working under the direction of and reporting to the undersigned officers of the congress.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOS. E. RANSDELL, President.
J. F. ELLISON,
Secretary and Treasurer.

I most heartily indorse the above appeal and sincerely hope that in view of the great benefit to our city to be derived from the improvement of the Ohio River that our people will cheerfully contribute toward the expense involved in carrying on the work of this organization.

WM. B. RODGERS, Director.

It is hardly possible that any casual reader will overlook the fact that Mr. Williams, of 50 per cent collection fame, is now working on other prospects. Also we meet with our old friend Capt. Ellison.

Again we find Pennsylvania generously contributing to the Rivers and Harbors Congress, and across the Alleghenies we find the Steel Trust reaching hands with the Sugar Trust; but the most interesting phase of the foregoing subscription list lies in the fact that while the total reaches $4,025, and presumably does not include all Pittsburgh contributions, the report of the treasurer of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, Mr. Ellison, of good advice, for the following year, mentions only $105 from Pittsburgh. I hold other subscription lists from Pittsburgh, which prove that the business concerns there are generous contributors. What the members of the Rivers and Harbors Congress and the public generally will desire to know is whether or not Mr. Williams increased his commission from 50 per cent to 95 per cent of the collections when visiting the Smoky City. If more was collected, how has it been accounted for? A congressional investigation would explain this apparent discrepancy of 95 per cent in collections within one year, and also the Baltimore collections and other discrepancies, that indicate much larger contributions than appear from the report of Secretary Ellison.

NEW JERSEY'S CONTRIBUTORS.

Again referring to the report of the treasurer of the Rivers and Harbors Congress for 1911, it appears that $120 is contributed by Newark to keep the ship of the Rivers and Harbors Congress on an even keel. Without analyzing the following subscription list, it is apparent that New Jersey has been a generous and a frequent contributor in the effort to secure its share of $50,000,000 in annual appropriations for the river and harbor bills regularly confronting Congress, war tax or no war tax.

Senator KENYON'S list of 1910 subscriptions from New Jersey is also of interest. I presented it in connection with his remarks.

COL. FOX AND MR. ROCKEFELLER.

How much did Col. Fox collect from John D. Rockefeller?

Col. John Fox is the leading publicity agent for the lower Mississippi River and for the River and Harbor Congress. In my remarks contained in the RECORD for June 19 last, I gave some special notice to the extended operations of Col. Fox among newspapers and magazines while engaged in his labors directing public sentiment. Without question he has successfully kept his waterway proposition in the public eye for several years, and frequent expressions of universal concern over lower Mississippi floods were usually inspired by Col. Fox, publicity agent, for his great land-reclamation scheme. If further data than that already furnished are desired, an investigation will disclose the facts.

Col. Fox has been the head and shoulders of waterway activities, even to the extent of showing Congressmen what to do and when and where to do it. As he modestly stated before the association which he so cleverly pilots:

> We will see to it that he (the Congressman) votes that the $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 that are needed every year toward completing this great work shall be appropriated.

During the recent fight in the Senate to defeat the pork barrel, Col. Fox, the congressional guardian, occupied a front seat in the Senators' private gallery, pulling for the bill. And Col. Fox's pull should not be ignored.

I presented to the House on a former occasion what purports to be a photographic copy of subscription lists secured by Mr. Fox for the lower Mississippi River reclamation project, which reached the neat sum of $150,000, according to his statement, in annual contributions.

It included liberal subscriptions from many railroads, the Harvester Trust, and other large interests which presumably have holdings in lands that are to be redeemed or reclaimed at the expense of the National Government. I will refer to that list again.

A FAMOUS NEW YORK LUNCHEON.

How much did Col. Fox, special field director of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, receive from John D. Rockefeller? That he solicited funds I am sure Mr. Gates, Mr. Rockefeller's representative, will admit, and the records ought to show how much. How much did Col. Fox raise in New York, where he and Col. Stevens, also an agent of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, gave a notable luncheon at the Mechanics' Club, New York City, in 1910? Hon. Nathan Straus, Mr. Havemeyer, John Hays Hammond, C. M. Schwab, and a number of other distinguished citizens were among the invited guests. These guests are among New York's leading men. Some of them are noted for public spirit and great wealth. How much did Mr. Fox collect from these gentlemen, and what became of the funds? How much was employed in pushing the back-fire against Senators while Special Field Director Fox, from his seat in the Senate gallery, like a field marshal of old, watched his commander, the president of the congress, marshaling his hosts in battle array.

We have learned that the congress received contributions from the Steel Trust at Pittsburgh and from the Standard Oil Trust at New York and from the Harvester Trust at New Orleans. Philadelphia also gave a small contribution from the Sugar Trust. But how much came from the great organizers of trusts, Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Havemeyer, as well as from the distinguished guests who were invited to meet Col. Fox at that luncheon?

EATING HIS WAY INTO PLUTOCRACY.

I feel sure Col. Fox will not deny the Rockefeller incident nor the luncheon, because I have examined what I believe to be interesting original correspondence on the subject. It sustains the belief that if Col. Fox was on the 50 per cent commission list for his congress collections, he wasted no time in getting to the fountainhead of individual wealth with that same alacrity evidenced when he annually lands on the Federal Treasury for $50,000,000.

How much did he raise in New York, from whom, and how was it spent? Is it a matter of record? If so, where?

In view of the fruitful offerings from railroads and other sources that greeted Col. Fox's efforts elsewhere, a waiting public and even the River and Harbor Congress would be interested in knowing how much was raised through that luncheon; and how was it expended? We must not forget that the dredgers' secret report recommended feeding Members of Congress at banquets. The Ohio Valley Society is shown to have expended some $1,500 for the same general purpose on one occasion. Money was contributed by the Central Life Insurance Co. and hundreds of other subscribers along the Ohio River.

With this object lesson in waterway improvement and land reclamation before him, Col. Fox undoubtedly attempted to reach his distinguished New York guests through their gastronomical organs. How well he succeeded will be disclosed by an investigation.

That the score or more of waterway associations, aside from the Rivers and Harbors Congress, are all giving active aggressive support to the passage of every rivers and harbors bill may be generally understood, but the amounts collected and the character of expenditures are not matters of general knowledge. Leaving for the time being the larger organization, that places a protecting wing over all other waterway associations and all projects, whether good, bad, or indifferent, when once incorporated into a $50,000,000 annual pork barrel, I will offer two or three subscription lists which indicate that in efforts to persuade Congress that particular projects are of value thousands of dollars are handled annually by organizations that rank second to and are closely affiliated with the Rivers and Harbors Congress.

RAILROAD CONTRIBUTIONS.

On June 3, on pages 10591 to 10599 of the RECORD, appear my remarks before the House wherein I pointed out secret efforts to influence Congress on rivers and harbors bills from subscriptions of money to the use of threats against business men. At that time I presented the following subscriptions, running for five years, taken from what purported to be a photographic copy of a typewritten statement made by Col. John A. Fox, secretary and manager of the Mississippi Levee Association:

It has been estimated that a minimum fund of $30,000 per annum is necessary for this organization to do its work in a complete and thorough manner, and already a considerable portion of this sum has been pledged annually for five years (or $150,000 in all). The subscriptions are as follows:

Southern Ry. Co	$1,000
Mobile & Ohio R. R. Co	1,000
Frisco R. R. Co	1,000
Missouri Pacific Ry. Co	1,000
Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co	1,000
St. Louis & Southwestern Ry. Co	1,000
Illinois Central R. R. Co	1,000
Yazoo & Mississippi Valley R. R. Co	1,000
Chicago Mill & Lumber Co	1,000
Caldwell & Smith, Memphis	1,000
International Harvester Co	1,000

Assurance has been given of other substantial amounts.

As I have before stated, on June 3 I called the attention of the House to contributions made by eight railways for the purpose of aiding in the passage of a river pork barrel. It will be remembered that contributions approximating $150,000 for the five-year period were given in the RECORD, and it was further shown that $40,000 of this amount was guaranteed by eight railroads for the purpose of influencing Congress to pass the bill. At that time I asked why an investigation was not had of this remarkable situation, and I further demanded in my resolution that all interests engaged in lobbying through such bills should be compelled to come out in the open.

A congressional investigation would be wonderfully enlightening in showing what other contributions reached the hands of Col. Fox, who is special director of the Rivers and Harbors Congress and an active publicity agent second to none in the country, as I have offered abundant testimony to prove.

CINCINNATI IS WIDE-AWAKE.

I hold what purports to be a detailed statement of the Cincinnati subscriptions for 1909 of the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, amounting to $4,566.25. Capt. Ellison, the secretary of the association, was later secretary of the Rivers and Harbors Congress. I will not set forth at length the list, which reaches nearly 200 subscribers, nor do I question the right of these individuals to subscribe any amount desired to advance the Ohio River propaganda. The list includes the name of a distinguished brother of the then President of the United States, and of others interested in urging the Ohio River proposition in Congress. The Union Central Life Insurance Co., which, I believe, had mutualized before that year, was a contributor, according to the list, whether with or without the consent of policyholders does not appear. Contract companies, transportation companies, and even the United Commercial Travelers were persuaded to contribute.

The Business Men's Club put in $100, and the next space is filled by an ice concern, in order to preserve an equable distribution of temperature throughout the list. Many banking interests joined in the propaganda, also brewing companies gave liberally, and everything that looked easy along the Ohio seems to have been solicited in the "On to Cairo" movement.

In view of the report made by the Commissioner of Corporations that all the terminals at Cairo and most of those at Cincinnati are owned by the railways, it is interesting to note that no railway subscriptions appear in this particular list.

The treasurer's statement to our friend Ellison follows:

QUEEN CITY SUPPLY CO.,
Cincinnati, October 27, 1909.

Capt. J. F. ELLISON, Secretary Ohio Valley Improvement Association, City.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to the recent convention in our city of the Ohio Valley Improvement Association, I submit, as treasurer, the following:

Subscriptions received, as per list herewith attached	$4,566.25
Payments for entertainment and all other expenses, as per vouchers herewith attached	1,543.44
Leaving a balance of	3,022.81

For which please find check herewith. This check is in accordance with the understanding of the committee and the Ohio Valley Improvement Association.

Yours, truly, GEO. PUCHTA.

MR. WILLIAMS IS BEARER OF A CONSTANT TOUCH.

Here follows a gem among a collector's jewels. It purports to be for Portsmouth, Ohio, for 1913, and introduces our old tried and true friend, Mr. John M. Williams, who is alleged to have a contract with the secretary of the Rivers and Harbors Congress for 50 per cent fee for certain collection.

It is not uninteresting to note that portion of the letter introducing Mr. Williams, which feelingly declares:

We must be in constant touch with the Rivers and Harbors Committee while Congress is in session and this can only be done through the presence of our president in Washington.

From which it appears no "touch" is overlooked. What more eloquent plea for funds can be imagined than the following:

Unless the business interests continue their support other more active and progressive sections of the country clamoring for similar appropriations will crowd us out. Such a result would be not only humiliating but most deplorable from every point of view.

Remembering that in the two 1914 bills, the sundry civil and the regular pork barrel, a total of some $9,176,000 was set apart for the Ohio, it does not look very humiliating in amount compared with Chicago, which carries at its two ports practically the same tonnage as the entire Ohio River, according to Government reports, and gets about one hundredth part of the amount given to the Ohio.

The 1913 touch overlooked no small towns. The letter follows:

"ON TO CAIRO."

OHIO VALLEY IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Portsmouth, Ohio, 1913.

To the business interests:

A widespread feeling that the Ohio River improvement is positively assured and that no further occasion for attention to the matter exists is now the greatest barrier against its early completion.

What has been accomplished is the definite adoption of the project by Congress, and annual instead of triennial appropriations have been secured. But the appropriations are not large enough by far to complete the work within a reasonable time. To insure such completion the project must be put, in point of appropriations, on the Panama Canal basis, so that the work may be prosecuted on a large scale all along the line.

Nothing short of manifestations of public interest and constant planning and agitation on the part of the Ohio Valley Improvement Association will accomplish this. We must be in constant touch with the Rivers and Harbors Committee while Congress is in session, and this can only be done through the presence of our president in Washington. In addition we must keep up the interest all along the river and throughout the Ohio Valley.

Unless the business interests continue their support, other more active and progressive sections of the country clamoring for similar appropriations will crowd us out. Such a result would be not only humiliating but most deplorable from every point of view.

We trust that this appeal will meet a financial response commensurate with the tremendous importance of the subject.

The bearer, John M. Williams, or H. M. Parsons are authorized to receive and receipt for all moneys subscribed.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. C. GULKINS, Secretary.

Approved and indorsed.

For fear it may be assumed that this "On to Cairo" is a cheap movement, I offer a Pittsburgh list of subscribers. Other lists for other years contain similar names and amounts. Among the many collection lists I have scanned this one has some unusually interesting and instructive features. It introduces our old friend Mr. Williams, who is alleged to have a contract with the National Rivers and Harbors Congress for 50 per cent of certain collections. An investigation would determine the facts in view of the announcement that—

The records of the association for the past 12 years is a guaranty that all funds subscribed to the association will be devoted entirely and effectively to the work for which the association was formed, viz, the improvement of the Ohio River.

So Pittsburgh gets to work to land its share, and we find the Consolidated Coke & Coal Co. that controls most of the navigation contributing $500 annually, which amount, however, is matched dollar for dollar by the Carnegie Steel Co. This list only gives a few of the larger amounts that are contributed by the interests that are "keeping in constant touch with the River and Harbor Committee," to use an expression contained in the Portsmouth (Ohio) letter.

A $5,000 TOUCH WITH PITTSBURGH.

"ON TO CAIRO."

OHIO VALLEY IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
No. 204 East Front Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, July 1, 1907.

To the business interests of Pittsburgh, Pa.:

The Ohio Valley Improvement Association in its work to secure legislation for the advancement of the movement to improve the Ohio River from Pittsburgh to Cairo, on the basis of a 9-foot stage, with its consequent enhancement for transportation facilities, solicits financial cooperation, which is necessary in order that the work may proceed systematically and uninterruptedly.

Mr. John M Williams, the general agent of the association, is authorized to receive and receipt for all moneys that may be subscribed. He is working under the direction of and reporting to the undersigned and officers of the association.

The records of the association for the past 12 years is a guaranty that all funds subscribed to the association will be devoted entirely and effectively to the work for which the association was formed, viz, the improvement of the Ohio River.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN L. VANCE, President.

J. F. ELLISON,
Secretary and Treasurer.

We strongly approve the above, and urge the business interests of Pittsburgh to subscribe liberally to support and advance the work of the association.

I have other subscription lists that are of equal interest and amount, but I have refrained from introducing more than a single list from several cities, although annual contributions appear to have been generously made in different cases.

Have I made a case that deserves investigation? The suggestion by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that the River and Harbor Committee intends to smother the resolutions asking for an investigation must have been made with authority. Ordinarily I would have no hesitation in leaving my case with any committee, and it is needless to express my high respect for the members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, individually and collectively, but I do not believe any investigation ought to be undertaken unless it is serious and thorough in character.

No man would care to try his case before a judge or judges who were not impartial. The absurdity of wasting the time of that committee or of myself in a fruitless undertaking was apparent from the first, but courtesy compelled me to await its orders. Now that it appears to be useless, I have undertaken to present to the House and to the country a portion of the evidence, most of which I believe to be original in character, and which has been held in my hands for the committee's use.

TRYING TO GET AT THE FACTS.

On May 4, nearly five months ago, I introduced House concurrent resolution No. 38. It proposed to secure information that would have opened up to the taxpayers, who foot the bills, concealed conditions behind the $50,000,000 annual loot bill.

In its wisdom the Rivers and Harbors Committee, to which the resolution was referred and which prepares the annual bill, ignored the appeal for an investigation.

On August 25 I introduced House resolution No. 603, which sets forth the progress of the rivers and harbors bill after it left the House and reiterates a demand for an investigation. This resolution, affecting an annual grab of $50,000,000 was too unimportant to receive any more attention than its predecessor, and as it presents some interesting propositions to the patient investigator I incorporate it in my remarks at this point:

[H. Res. 603. Sixty-third Congress, second session. In the House of Representatives, August 25, 1914. Mr. FREAR submitted the following resolution which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed.]

Whereas the rivers and harbors bill as it passed the House carried $43,389,000 in cash and over $76,000,000, including proposed dribbling appropriations, for new projects; and

Whereas the said rivers and harbors bill, now under consideration by another body, has had added to it by the committee of said body over $10,000,000 in additional cash items over and above the $43,000,000 contained in the House bill; and

Whereas some of the items so added had been previously refused approval and place in the bill by the House committee; and

Whereas the said committee of such other body has now stricken from said bill as passed by the House approximately $1,000,000 alleged to have been for wasteful and vicious items, including $72,000 for Mattawan Creek, $47,000 for Kissimmee Creek, $733,000, present and prospective, for Okalawaha Creek, and various amounts for other insignificant creeks; and

Whereas it is currently reported that a proposal is pending to strike from the $53,000,000 rivers and harbors bill, now before another body, approximately $10,000,000, thereby leaving the amount of the appropriation at practically the figures approved by the House, but upon different projects; and

Whereas the Chief Engineer of the Army is authoritatively quoted as stating that not more than one-half of 1 per cent contained in the present bill is "pork"; and

A $93,000,000 PORK BARREL FOR 1914.

Whereas approximately $7,000,000 has been appropriated by Congress during the present session by the sundry civil bill of 1914 for river and harbor improvements in addition to the pending bill of $53,000,000 cash and $33,000,000 new projects, or approximately $93,000,000 in cash and new projects for 1914; and

Whereas press dispatches report that employees of a House committee have circulated letters of inquiry throughout the country asking if people of the particular locality affected by the 400 different projects included in said bill are ready to concede that the local project is a "humbug and a fraud"; and

Whereas House concurrent resolution 38, introduced on the 4th day of May, 1914, is now before said House committee for action and in words and substance is as follows:

Whereas many millions of dollars of public moneys are annually wasted on our rivers and an absence of businesslike methods is being pursued by the Government in carrying on river and harbor improvements, the following facts are submitted as a preamble in support of this resolution:

That on March 17, 1914, the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee stated to the House as follows: "Why, there are propositions advanced, some of them are now before Congress, advocated and supported by men of national repute, the adoption and carrying out of which, it is said by competent engineers, would cost billions of dollars";

That river and harbor appropriations have increased approximately 500 per cent, while navigation on rivers has decreased 80 per cent, as is shown by the following Government data:

Appropriations for rivers and harbors: 1875 to 1894 (20 years), $187,099,000; 1894 to 1904 (10 years), $184,425,000; 1911 to 1914 (4 years), $184,345,000;

The following river traffic is reported from the city of St. Louis: Missouri River, 1890, 31,385 tons; 1906, 6,050 tons; loss, 80 per cent. Lower Mississippi, 1890, 765,880 tons; 1906, 141,575 tons; loss, 81 per cent;

That commerce on practically all of the inland waterways, excepting the Great Lakes, has greatly decreased and often been driven from the rivers by railway competition;

That the Interstate Commerce Commission and railway commissions of the several States have general powers to reduce railway freight rates wherever conditions warrant and to prevent increase wherever reduction has been made;

That the river and harbor bill for 1914 as passed by the House appropriates or authorizes an expenditure of $43,289,004, in addition to $32,895,871 in new projects begun and to be maintained by continuing appropriations from future Congresses, in all calling for a proposed expenditure of $76,184,875. To this vast amount, judging from past experience, will be added from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 before the bill is returned from the Senate;

That the adopted projects which we are obligated to complete, including those embraced in the 1914 bill, include a future expenditure of $305,500,000;

That in addition thereto the Army engineers have recommended 93 new projects, which will require a further expenditure of $92,500,000 whenever Congress can be prevailed upon to make such appropriations;

That 120 additional surveys are authorized by the 1914 bill as it passed the House, which will require an indefinite amount for such projects, possibly reaching $100,000,000, judging from the average last noted;

BILLIONS OF DOLLARS FOR PORK BARRELS.

That to these extravagant expenditures will eventually be added billions of dollars, according to the opinion of the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, whenever men of national repute now advocating and supporting other projects can secure their adoption;

That the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriates $9,500,000 for the Mississippi River, 84 per cent of which is to be expended on the lower river, notwithstanding its commerce decreased over 80 per cent during the past 20 years;

That the Mississippi River Commission on April 14, 1914, at St. Louis, recommended to Congress a further appropriation of $12,000,000 for the Mississippi River for next year;

That the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriates $2,000,000 for the lower Missouri River between Kansas City and the Mississippi, which appropriation is part of a $20,000,000 project for that portion of the river, notwithstanding traffic is negligible and actual commerce is alleged to have cost the Government approximately $100 per ton for 1912;

That the 1914 bill as it passed the House appropriates $5,000,000 for canalization along the Ohio River, a $64,000,000 project, comprehending 63 locks, but no part of the open-river service. Canal freight for 1912 is alleged to have cost the Government over $35 per ton, after allowing full railway freight rates for coal traffic;

That after spending many millions of dollars on the Coosa, Trinity, Brazos, and Red Rivers, these projects are now alleged to be of no practical benefit to navigation.

That the intracoastal waterways project, present and postponed, as reported by the Government engineers, involves a past, present, and proposed expenditure of $96,931,006;

That this system includes the construction of new canals of doubtful value, the purchase, through the 1914 bill, of a bankrupt canal proposition, the stock of which is shown to be worthless; of projects that propose to especially benefit certain communities to the injury of others, and projects which it is alleged will drive legitimate private waterway ventures into bankruptcy;

That the 1914 bill as passed by the House contains appropriations for projects where the expenditure, according to engineers' reports, is exclusively for local private business interests and not for use by the general public;

That the 1914 bill as passed by the House contains appropriations for creeks which, according to the accompanying engineers' reports, are dry for eight months in the year;

That the 1914 bill as passed by the House contains appropriations for creeks involving in a single instance an appropriation of $750,000, wherein it is alleged the engineers' report was reversed after real estate speculators had brought political pressure to bear in such case;

That the 1914 bill does not carry appropriations for the amount required to complete projects as asked for by the engineers in many cases, thereby preventing the Government from entering into proper or profitable contracts until full appropriations are made;

That the 1914 bill is open to all the objections urged by President Taft against the 1910 bill for the last mentioned reasons and contains wasteful appropriations amounting to many millions of dollars;

Therefore, for the foregoing reasons, it is

LET THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION INVESTIGATE.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to immediately investigate and as soon as practicable report to Congress the following information:

First. The character and amount of proposed expenditures by the Government now being advocated and supported "by men of national repute," as stated on the floor of the House, the adoption and carrying out of which will cost billions of dollars.

Second. The character and value to the general public of projects to which the Government is now committed aggregating $305,000,000.

Third. The character and value to the general public of 93 new projects recommended by Army engineers but not yet adopted by Congress, which will require a further expenditure of $92,500,000.

Fourth. The character and value to the general public of 120 new surveys authorized by the 1914 bill as it passed the House, which will require an indefinite amount reaching to over $100,000,000, based on average last noted, providing such projects are recommended by the Army engineers.

Fifth. To report all river or harbor projects begun and afterwards abandoned by the Government within the past 40 years, together with all expenditures so wasted and reasons for such abandonment.

Sixth. To report as to the truth or falsity of the statement made upon the floor of the Senate that "the whole scheme of river improvement is a humbug and a steal," and to report further as to the truth or falsity of statements made during debate in the House that the river and harbor bill for 1914 as it passed the House is a fraud upon the people, a pork-barrel raid upon the Federal Treasury, approximating in its scope an expenditure of over $76,000,000, and more vicious in character than any of its predecessors.

Seventh. To investigate and report all active influences urging the adoption of the Mississippi River reclamation, the Ohio River canalization, the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal, and other projects contained in the 1914 bill as it passed the House, together with the names of all organizations, companies, individuals, or hired lobbyists now actively engaged in urging such projects.

INVESTIGATE THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER LAND RECLAMATION SCHEME.

Eighth. To report fully as to the Mississippi River reclamation project, its probable cost, local benefits to be conferred, and value of any lands to be reclaimed; the ownership of such lands; the contributions equitably required from adjoining States, municipalities, or individual interests, if any; the injuries to Memphis, Vicksburg, or other communities alleged on the floor of the House to have been caused by ill-advised engineering projects, and further to report as to the permanence of the reclamation project and probable value compared with Government expenditures required.

Ninth. To investigate and report as to the desirability of having the Government take over the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal at double its actual value fixed by the House committee; to report whether the canal company stock is worthless and its bonds valued at only 50 cents on the dollar, as stated on the floor of the House; to report whether this canal project can be completed for $10,514,290, as estimated by the Army engineers; to report whether such amount includes the Government contribution of $450,000, made about 90 years ago, and interest and dividends wrongfully withheld during that period; and to report further whether or not the project is to be taken over for the especial benefit of canal bondholders and shipping interests of Baltimore and Philadelphia. In making such investigation the commission is directed to not limit its hearings to stock and bond holders of the canal company, or to local political influences or interested shipping interests of Baltimore and Philadelphia.

Tenth. To report further what river and harbor projects now under consideration are for the benefit of strictly private business interests, without corresponding benefits to the general public, and the interests that secured such projects for such interests.

Eleventh. To report what proportionate benefits should occasion contributions, and to what extent, from local communities, particularly where improvements are of strictly local value and of no material aid to navigation.

Twelfth. To report the financial policy or absence of policy pursued by the Government as to the rivers and harbors during the past 40 years; benefits that have accrued to the public through improved river navigation and increased river traffic, if any, resulting from such improvements, together with all further available information on the subject that may be had, together with such recommendations based thereon as may be found proper to make in the premises, having particular reference to the following information:

Thirteenth. To report the practicability of taking away from the Chief of Army Engineers the exclusive right and power of determining the commercial necessity of river and harbor projects and leaving with the Army Engineer Bureau the single question of technical engineering work.

Fourteenth. To report the practicability of turning over to the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Department of Commerce all river and harbor improvements, with full power to exercise all the duties now imposed upon the Army Engineer Bureau, excepting such duties as strictly pertain to civil engineering; and

LET THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE INVESTIGATE.

Whereas no report has been made to the House in reference to such resolution, nor has any hearing been called for its consideration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House Judiciary Committee, in lieu of the Interstate Commerce Commission, be requested to hold hearings upon said resolution (H. Res. 38) at the earliest practicable day and to report to the House its findings, in order that the House membership may be informed as to the facts contained in recitals in such resolutions.

Resolved further, That said committee be directed to ascertain from the Chief of Engineers of the Army what $260,000 contained in the rivers and harbors bill, being approximately one-half of 1 per cent, is conceded to be "pork."

Resolved further, That such committee be directed to ascertain if the appropriations struck out of the bill for the Kissimmee, Mattawan, Oklawaha, and other creeks, amounting to approximately $1,000,000, consist of wasteful and improper items, as found by the committee of another body.

Resolved further, That such committee be directed to ascertain if the additional amount of $10,000,000 in items proposed to be struck out by such other committee consists, as alleged, of wasteful and improper items.

Resolved further, That such committee ascertain the importance and character of the $10,000,000 added to the House bill of $43,000,000 by such other committee, and that the result of such investigation be reported to the House at the earliest possible moment, together with its recommendations thereon; and the said Judiciary Committee is hereby authorized and empowered to issue subpœnas and examine witnesses and to procure all documents bearing upon the matters referred to, and to employ needed stenographers and clerks in the prosecution of such inquiry.

AN EFFORT TO INVESTIGATE THE DREDGERS' PUSH.

Having proof of the dredgers' secret agreement to push pork barrels, which I have already placed in my remarks, together with the confidential list furnished to the collector of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, supported by subscriptions from the dredgers to push the $50,000,000 barrel, and with a full understanding that the terrific back-fire waged on Congress was part of a concerted action which would not stand up in the light of publicity, I offered House resolution No. 612, asking for an investigation of the activities of the dredgers' secret organization, that reads as follows:

[H. Res. 612, Sixty-third Congress, second session. In the House of Representatives, August 29, 1914. Mr. FREAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed.]

Whereas the press of the country has been giving consideration to the unprecedented haul on the Treasury sought to be made by the $53,000,000 rivers and harbors bill for 1914, which bill, with future dribbling appropriations for new projects, will reach approximately $86,000,000; and

Whereas $45,000,000 of unexpended appropriations is still available for contracts now being performed; and

Whereas a further sum of $6,990,000 has been appropriated by the present Congress, under the sundry civil bill for 1914, for the improvement of rivers and harbors; and

Whereas it is probable that nine hundred and ninety-nine persons out of every thousand receive no benefits, directly or indirectly, from the large mass of 1914 appropriations; that the great majority of our people are ignorant of the unprecedented size and wasteful character of the 1914 river and harbor bill disclosed by engineers and other governmental reports; and

Whereas, notwithstanding such overwhelming popular disapproval, a persistent secret back-fire has been inaugurated in the several States to the end that commercial bodies and individuals of local influence are now engaged in importuning Members of Congress to pass the $53,000,000 bill in addition to the $6,990,000 sundry civil items already enacted into the law and the $45,000,000 left available on June 30 last; and

Whereas the secret back-fire is believed to have been largely inaugurated by individuals and concerns having personal interests in performing the work, or by communities and individuals favorable to some particular project irrespective of the remaining hundreds of projects, many of which have been exposed as wasteful and useless almost beyond belief; and

Whereas it is alleged that the dredgers of the country have in past years, through their official organization, sought to actively and secretly influence the passage of river and harbor legislation, as appears from the following extract, quoted from a report of the board of directors of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association, issued after the defeat of a former river and harbor bill, which extract from the signed report reads as follows:

DIVIDING THE SPOILS.

"We count in this association the membership and influence of every man engaged in the business: each one has something of value to us in the way of ideas, talent, energy, or influence, and it is the work of the association and its proper object and function to use these various factors for the benefit of the whole membership and to throw upon any desired point the full resources of the association. In this way, and by turning its steps in the right direction, and with full confidence and cooperation which it would then have from all its members, there would no longer be any grounds for contention or rivalry amongst one another. When once this department of allotment is abandoned, the association will once more resume its proper place and perform many duties of the highest use and importance to its members." (An apparent admission that all contracts are, or were, controlled by the board of directors and subsequently allotted to the different members by a dredging trust); and

Whereas the directors' report further states:

"The board should organize a bureau of information, which would furnish to each member at regular intervals a synopsis of what is going on in the way of dredging operations on the coast, improvements in machinery or in methods of doing work, with descriptions of such improvements, locations, etc., and the general work beir; done by and through committees and in the board of directors—this and such other additional information as may suggest itself.

"The lack of association methods and the failure to use the means in our hands for the general good was forcibly illustrated recently in the rivers and harbors bill, where absolutely no effort was made by the association to procure any amendment to the bill or any provision inserted therein for its benefit"; and

FILLING UP MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Whereas the directors' report states:

"Your board feels regret that the river and harbor bill has failed of passage, and considers it all the more important that the association should be organized for the purpose of adding its influence to urging work by municipal organizations and bodies, and doing all in their power to create offerings of work in the various ports of entry and harbors. It is only by persistent effort that the loss entailed upon us by the failure of the harbor bill can in any way be compensated for. Your board further wishes to emphasize their regret that the annual banquet of the association has been allowed to go by default for the last two or three years. These entertainments do not entail any serious expense upon the association, but they do create the greatest possible prestige for our business in the estimation of those whose favor it is to our advantage to gain. Influential business men and men of public affairs having to do with transportation companies and steamship lines are entertained by us on these occasions with the greatest possible benefit to our business—municipal officers, heads of departments, Members of Congress, and legislatures—and their favor and interest is legitimately gained and has been found to be of the greatest value when circumstances required it. The expense of our entertainment is wisely expended, and brings an adequate return for every dollar so spent"; and

Whereas it is reasonable to believe from such statements that said dredgers' association is secretly and actively aiding in the back fire now being urged upon Congress by commercial bodies that are particularly interested over their local projects, and to the exclusion of other items, good, bad, and indifferent, and, further, that said board may now control all dredging contracts, as suggested in such report, to be hereafter allotted to the different members; and

Whereas House resolution 603, heretofore introduced, asks the Judiciary Committee of the House to investigate the present system of making up river and harbor appropriations, and for other information relating thereto, as is more specifically set forth in said resolution, and to include all secret lobby methods used heretofore and now to urge the passage of such bills: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the House be instructed to bring before it the officers and board of directors of the Atlantic and Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association, and such other parties as may be deemed advisable, and ascertain what efforts have been exerted toward securing the passage of the rivers and harbors bills in past years, its methods of allotments of contracts, and what connection, if any, such organization or the membership thereof have with the remarkable secret back fire now being urged in Congress in behalf of the 1914 bill.

A WAR TAX AND THE LOBBY.

In a further effort to attract publicity to the back-fire waged by the officers of the $50,000,000 annual loot, war cry bill, that had $9,000,000 at stake for the lower Mississippi land reclamation scheme, as heretofore set forth, I introduced House concurrent resolution No. 49. It refers to the activities of the officers of the Rivers and Harbors Congress, and is as follows:

[H. Con. Res. 49. Sixty-third Congress, second session. In the House of Representative September 17, 1914. Mr. FREAR submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.]

Whereas the President has asked Congress to pass a war tax of $100,000,000, to be imposed upon 100,000,000 consumers in the country, for the purpose of meeting expenses of Government, including an anticipated wasteful rivers and harbors appropriation bill now pending before Congress amounting to $53,000,000, and also for an additional $52,000,000 for rivers and harbors, which last-mentioned amount is a balance authorized to be expended from preceding appropriations; and

Whereas the total proposed expenditures for rivers and harbors in 1914 is six times the total expenditures for the four years from 1875 to 1878, inclusive, when commerce on the rivers of the country carried four times the present diminishing traffic, according to Government reports; and

Whereas the proposed $105,000,000 expenditures for rivers and harbors, for which a war tax must be levied, includes many millions of dollars of wasteful and extravagant projects, according to the opinion of experienced waterway experts throughout the country; and

Whereas the demand for a wax tax directs public attention to the present extravagant business management of the country which reaches in appropriations, exclusive of rivers and harbors, the unprecedented sum of $1,057,605,694.40 for 1914 and $1,089,408,777.26 for 1915, and which latter amount exceeds all appropriations for 1913 by over $100,000,000; and

Whereas any demand for a war tax to meet unparalleled expenditures for rivers and harbors or for other Government purposes directs public attention toward insidious lobbies that seek to shape legislation at Washington and perform other functions not contemplated under the Constitution; and

Whereas the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and the Mississippi Levee Association are alleged to be practically identical in aims and character; organized primarily to advance lower Mississippi River land reclamation interests, interests which are given by the 1914 rivers and harbors bill the unprecedented sum of $9,000,000, part of over $100,000,000, counting unexpended balances previously appropriated for waterway purposes; a large part of which enormous fund, in the judgment of the best and most experienced waterway experts in the country, is to be wasted on crooked creeks and ill-advised waterway projects; and

INVESTIGATE THE BACK FIRE.

Whereas it is alleged on trustworthy authority that the National Rivers and Harbors Congress has sent thousands of letters throughout the country and has also sent its agents to different points in the country extending from the Atlantic coast on the east to Astoria, Oreg., on the west, in order to persuade local commercial organizations to pass resolutions which demand the passage of the 1914 rivers and harbors bill, and further demand the constant attendance of Members of Congress to preserve a quorum in order to pass such a bill; and

Whereas the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and its kindred Lower Mississippi River Levee Association has been charged by a reputable waterway organization with instigating threats against Pennsylvania manufacturers and other eastern business men in order to compel the support of local Members of Congress for lower Mississippi River projects in the manner and form set forth in H. Res. 613; and

Whereas it is alleged that through secret, insidious, persistent, and unprecedented lobbying methods southern river contractors and other parties interested in the passage of the 1914 rivers and harbors bill are demanding, as a price of transacting business with Ohio manufacturers, immediate efforts by such Ohio business men to compel support of such vicious bill by Ohio Representatives in either branch of Congress; and

Whereas it is further alleged that the National Rivers and Harbors Congress with its affiliated Lower Mississippi River Levee Association has sought to have enacted into law Louisiana House bill No. 514, which bill endeavors to make legal contributions of $1,000 annually by all State levee boards in order "to encourage the growth of public sentiment favoring increased national appropriations for the construction and maintenance of the system of Mississippi River levees"; and

LET US ASCERTAIN RAILWAY INFLUENCES.

Whereas it is further alleged in addition to contributions sought to be obtained from the State of Louisiana to secure increased Federal appropriations for the lower Mississippi River, hundreds of thousands of dollars have been collected by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress and the Mississippi Levee Association, including annual contributions from thousands of organizations throughout the United States including the Newark Board of Trade; the Trenton Board of Trade; the Standard Oil Trust; the International Harvester Trust; the Southern Railway Co.; the Mobile & Ohio Railway Co.; the Frisco Railway Co.; the Missouri Pacific Railway Co.; the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co.; the Illinois Central Railway Co.; and thousands of other firms and individuals as set forth in part by H. Res. 613; and

Whereas it is further alleged that many thousands of dollars thus collected by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, from boards of trade, the Standard Oil Trust, contracting companies, and other individuals throughout the country were divided equally between the collecting agents of said "congress" and the "congress" itself, which congress retained one-half of the amount collected and yet declares itself to be second only to the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas such charge if true is a fraud upon all the contributors to such great fund, raised ostensibly to further improvements of waterways, but which fund is alleged to be used in entertaining and banqueting officials in high authority and for other lobbying purposes hereinbefore stated, in order to insure the passage of an annual $50,000,000 pork barrel through "a species of mutual bribery among those actively interested, all too much in evidence for the health of public morals and interests of the tax-paying public," according to the report of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, as set forth in H. Res. 613; and

Whereas it is alleged that said National Rivers and Harbors Congress, through its officers and agents and through its large fund collected as aforesaid, has assumed to determine the political fortunes of Senators and Representatives, the membership and composition of important congressional committees, the particular projects for which appropriations shall be granted, and the amount thereof, all of which if true is demoralizing to public legislation and the best interests of the country; and

Whereas if the foregoing allegations are true as contained in the report of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation; and as to allegations of equal division of subscription between the congress and its agents; and as to use of such money to send agents throughout the country to make false and improper statements as to the character of the vicious 1914 rivers and harbors bill; and as to activity of such agents in order to secretly and improperly influence the consideration of such bill; and as to efforts to force eastern business men to favor the Mississippi River reclamation project, and also efforts to force Ohio business men into creating a back fire against their Representatives in Congress; and as to other insidious and manifestly improper acts, then and in such case the Postmaster General ought to prohibit the use of the mails for such questionable and improper purposes: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Attorney General is hereby directed to ascertain the facts of such charges hereinbefore set forth, and if true in whole or in part to proceed without delay in prosecuting any and all parties engaged in unlawful practices, and to take such further action as may be deemed proper.

This resolution and others of similar tenor were given some degree of publicity and also attracted criticism from reputable journals. My attempts to secure an investigation received attention and strong support from many high-class publications throughout the country, including in the West notably the Chicago Tribune, but the Herald of that city questioned a "fanaticism rather than reason" in the following editorial, which I quote under date of September 17:

[From the Chicago Record-Herald, September 17.]

CONGRESSMAN FREAR GOES TOO FAR.

Representative FREAR, of Wisconsin, has done the country much good service by his persistence in calling attention to the "pork" in the river and harbor bill. But in his present attack on organizations of citizens formed to promote internal improvements Mr. FREAR is showing fanaticism rather than reason.

No brief is held here for the organizations called the Rivers and Harbors Congress or the Mississippi Levee Association. It is merely remarked that they are visibly composed, in the main, of respectable citizens, who should not be accused of anything in the nature of corrupt activities in legislation unless upon clear proof.

It is altogether probable, of course, that promoters of wasteful and useless expenditures have attached themselves to these organizations. Attempts are always made to attach schemes of private or merely local gain to any widespread movement. Quite possibly these organizations have been unduly tolerant of "log-rolling" tactics.

What Mr. FREAR forgets, however, is that there are some meritorious projects in the pending bill. It may be admitted that the ratio of them to the "pork" is more than usually low. Yet they are there, and should not be made to suffer because they are unavoidably in bad company.

Let Mr. FREAR cease to see ghosts of "insidious lobbies" and devote himself to getting the "pork" out of the bill. There is plenty of it to get out.

Here is an editor of a great journal asking us with childlike innocence to get the "pork" out of a bill, when he ought to know it could not be blown out with dynamite.

It is a matter of record that of scores of wasteful, vicious items exposed on the floor, no record vote could be had. In another body the vicious Trinity River $10,000,000 project only received a few votes of protest, although it was riddled by the criticisms of Senator BURTON and others. Good and bad projects float or sink together when in a pork barrel.

COMPLACENT IGNORANCE OF CONDITIONS.

No criticism is offered in reply to the editorial, because I do not reply to criticisms unless some good purpose may be served. The Herald is an influential paper and its voice on the side of the Government Treasury would be invaluable in these days of pork barrels, and war taxes with which to pay them. Probably a lack of knowledge of the real conditions may have inspired the charge.

Is it fanaticism to shout "Burglars" when you see the Treasury is being looted under the guise of waterway improvements? When land reclamationists, water-power interests, dredgers, contractors, and last, but not least, when a $50,000,000 war cry for annual plunder is echoed throughout 171 cities and their respective States that contribute, is it fanaticism to demand the facts?

To declare that the management of a railway needs investigation when the president and directors of the New Haven loot the road, does not attack the stockholders of the road who are entertained by pretty balloons that are kept dancing before their eyes. The members of the Rivers and Harbors Congress are not to blame, excepting that every stockholder should know what use is made of his name and funds.

I do not care to inject my own individual views into any discussion, but there has been shown beyond reasonable doubt by Senators BURTON, KENYON, GALLINGER, and others in both Houses of Congress that present waterway improvements financed by the Government are largely vicious in character, and are used to cover up other purposes than actual improvements to navigation. These expositions have been based on the reports of the very engineers who approved projects that were all originally supported by political influence.

The engineers are no more to blame than are those who successfully urged the wasteful projects. That is a minor consideration at this time; nor is the defeat of the 1914 pork barrel, with its temporary saving of $33,000,000 or $66,000,000, as you choose to figure it, the real question which confronts Congress and the country.

I have produced evidence that has not been disputed, showing that since the Rivers and Harbors Congress, with its associated waterway organizations, has been organized, notwithstanding river and canal traffic, has rapidly decreased, annual Government expenditures for wasteful projects have doubled and quadrupled.

Legitimate waterway projects have been choked by this effort to arouse local "cupidity," as it was termed by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation. The battle cry of $50,000,000 loot, without any attempt to control projects, aroused a vigorous protest from the leading commercial body of the country years ago.

In my remarks of June 3 I made reference to a report of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, which had refused to join hands with the association now boosting the Mississippi River, because of the fact that the association was a "log-rolling" concern founded on "mutual bribery." I have been asked to give in full this report, which was made by the New York board after a careful investigation into the methods of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. Believing that a report coming from one of the highest trade bodies of the world is of especial importance at this time, particularly as it relates to a proposal to filch $50,000,000 annually from the Federal Treasury, I herewith present the report containing its refusal to indorse what it denominates to be a mutual bribery organization:

THE NATIONAL RIVERS AND HARBORS CONGRESS.

NEW YORK, March 27, 1907.

To the New York Board of Trade and Transportation:

The undersigned special committee, appointed to consider the policy that this board should adopt toward the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, reports as follows:

The National Rivers and Harbors Congress is an alliance of individuals, firms, and corporations, waterway associations, and other organizations. It has a president, an executive committee, and a secretary-treasurer. The members of the association pay annual dues. Its object, as stated in its circulars, is "to arouse public interest to such an extent that a united demand, coming from all sections of the country for regular and adequate rivers and harbors appropriations, will induce Congress to provide an annual river and harbor bill of $50,000,000."

The New York Board of Trade and Transportation is invited and urged to become a member of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The chairman of your committee personally conferred with a representative of the organization and has been fully informed of its purposes and methods. Its whole work, as stated in the objects quoted, is to be directed toward making an effective demand upon Congress for appropriations. Its policy is that no specific projects of public improvement shall be individually indorsed by the organization. A general indorsement is given to all projects heretofore approved by the United States engineers and the completion of which would require from $320,000,000 to $350,000,000; but no effort is made to ascertain or verify the necessity of such projects and plans.

The organization, while advocating and demanding enormous and unprecedented appropriations from the Public Treasury, thus cleverly attempts to avoid all the responsibilities for its proper and honest expenditure. Another advantage to them of this policy is that they avoid all dissensions among themselves over the questions of merit as to the projects proposed. They welcome to the support of their cause everybody who wants an appropriation from the Treasury, and none is repulsed. The wonder is their numbers are not larger.

This fact should somewhat allay the fears of the taxpayers of the country as to the result, and as actually less than 5 per cent of the commercial organizations of the country have espoused the cause, or less than one-sixth as many organizations as demanded the passage of railroad-rate legislation, not including as many more agricultural societies, the movement has thus far failed to develop enough strength to make it dangerous.

It is manifest that such a plan should appeal strongly to many localities whose natural conditions are forbidding and unattractive to commerce and whose commerce is consequently small. It is quite within reasonable expectation that the people of such localities would be encouraged to hope or believe that by uniting to swell the demand for larger appropriations enough might be drawn from the Treasury to satisfy the demands of more necessitous projects and leave them a little by way of reward for their help and to encourage them to continue their "interest and cooperation." Every congressional district thus enlisted would deliver one additional vote in Congress for the blanket proposition.

THE PRESSURE ON CONGRESSMEN.

Nearly every Congressman is charged with procuring an appropriation for some project in his district. The approval of his constituency and often his reelection depends upon his success in getting an appropriation. He can not question the merits of the project for which such demands are made upon him. He may know that the project has no just claim upon the room of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors until he has worried a promise from the chairman. Thus the chairman of the committee has his troubles. It is a most Herculean task to sift out the bad and decide upon the merits of the numerous propositions which are brought to his attention. It requires most patient, painstaking study on his part to inform himself and to make sure that he is not imposed upon, and he must have extraordinary discretion, tact, and courage to put off importunate Congressmen and reject projects which investigation has convinced him are unworthy. Necessary projects must be passed for the good of the country and votes must be had to pass them. Frequently the price of a needed vote or several votes is the recognition of a project which would not otherwise have any consideration, and to get the important projects through the sacrifice is made, and so the bill is loaded. When the bill comes into the House with such items on it there is no one to object, because few, if any, of the Members know about the individual items. Even when occasionally a particularly objectionable item has been singled out for criticism in the newspapers, there is none to protest against it on the floor, because each Member must have his particular appropriation and it is understood that if the bill is to pass it must stand pat or fall as a whole. When one part of its structure is withdrawn, the harmony of the situation is gone and disintegration sets in.

The policy of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress would make the task no easier for the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. There would be more money to go around, but if the Rivers and Harbors Congress should succeed in their plan "to arouse public interest—they should have said 'cupidity'—to such an extent that a united demand, coming from all sections of the country," would develop new schemes of improvement before unheard of, the demands upon him for unworthy projects would be increased far out of proportion to the worthy ones, and so the difficulties would be aggravated.

ORGANIZED FOR MUTUAL BRIBERY.

It would foster beyond all previous experience the most pernicious of all methods of procuring legislation, known as "logrolling," a species of mutual bribery among those actively interested already too much in evidence for the health of public morals and the interests of the taxpaying public.

The present system may not be ideal, but the responsibility and power imposed in the important office of chairman of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors develops in the incumbent a conservatism and care for the public weal which establishes conditions and works out the problems in a way which it would be difficult to improve upon. The country has been in recent years especially fortunate in this respect. Mistakes may have been made. Some projects may have been for a time neglected which should have been more rapidly progressed, and some may have received more recognition than their importance would seem to warrant, but a proper appreciation of the difficulties of the office would foster a spirit of charity and compel commendation instead of criticism.

In conclusion, we desire to make our position clear. As an organization we have done much for the improvement of the water transportation. We may stand upon our record as to that, and will not swerve from our faith in the future; but we are opposed to the plans of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, and urge the business interests of the country to consider carefully the evils of the system which would result from its success.

It is the duty and should be the care of the exponent organizations throughout the country to guard at all times the public interests of the city, State, and Nation with unswerving integrity of purpose and to encourage by every means at their command the highest possible standard of action in all the affairs of our public life. They can not, without doing an injury to the body politic, shift from their own shoulders to others any responsibility which they themselves should assume. They can not, without giving conscientious and painstaking study and consideration, indorse important projects and measures or general and vaguely defined policies and leave to others the working of them out to a conclusion without danger of harm. The conditions inherent in our public life are such that the gravest dangers attend and menace the interests of the people at each step from the initiation and promotion to the consummation of all public measures and works under every branch of our Government. These conditions make easier the evasion of individual responsibility and discourage the expression of opposition to measures which appeal to the individual conscience as wrong. They foster cupidity and encourage duplicity and fraud, and where the objects in view depend for success upon access to the Public Treasury the moral resistance is relaxed.

We therefore view with apprehension this systematic propaganda by influential men and organizations, which our experience and judgment tells us, unless checked by the more conservative elements of the people, will ultimately lead to the wildest extravagance and waste of the public moneys which has ever marked our history.

REFUSES TO JOIN A "LOG-ROLLING" ORGANIZATION.

Your committee therefore recommends that the New York Board of Transportation and Trade decline the request to become a member of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

While expressing our disapproval of the methods of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress we have great pleasure in commending the action of President Roosevelt in appointing on the 14th of the present month the Inland Waterways Commission, whose duty will be to report a comprehensive plan for the improvement and control of the river systems of the United States. The President in his letter of appointment to the members of the commission, who have been manifestly selected for their eminent qualifications and fitness for the duty imposed, outlines at length his views, which are patriotic, broad, and comprehensive. The appointment of the Inland Waterways Commission is, to our minds, a first important step in the right direction, which gives promise of the development of a national plan, taking knowledge of all river improvements which should properly be nationalized, and eliminating the elements of danger to which we have hereinbefore referred.

Upon such a plan, which will indicate in advance what improvements are contemplated, what they will accomplish for the welfare of the country, and what they will cost, all the organizations of the country should unite.

Respectfully submitted.

A PORK-BARREL PROPHECY REALIZED.

The predictions made in that report appear to have been fully realized. An organization now controls the annual $50,000,000 pork barrel that has no responsibility to the people. It assumes to determine river and harbor legislation. Its battle cry is for $50,000,000 annually, and it makes no difference whether it goes to the fertilizing factories at Mattawan, at Shoal Harbor, or on the North East River, as disclosed by the Engineers' reports. It is immaterial whether it covers real estate interests on Florida projects or $9,000,000 in 1914 for a Mississippi River reclamation project. Everything goes, and when opposition develops in Congress, all the machinery at the disposal of the Rivers and Harbors Congress is put into force, demanding the pork bill's passage by a secret back-fire.

If it be fanaticism to say this astounding condition surrounding a great appropriation bill is wrong, then what is right? The puny efforts of Mulhall and the Manufacturers' Association sink into insignificance when compared with the $50,000,000 annual pork barrel, the guardianship of which amount the Federal Congress delegates to the Rivers and Harbors Congress, according to modest admissions of the latter body.

I have given more time to this subject than I intended, although I have only been able to briefly point out the wastefulness of the Mississippi land reclamation and flood project and the influences that are behind the $50,000,000 annual pork barrel.

WORKING FOR A NEW PORK BARREL.

Congress has been notified through many channels that the Rivers and Harbors Congress, which meets here during the coming December, will be here when Congress is in session. A thousand waterway enthusiasts who do not know the secret work of their congress will then press on the Federal Congress a $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 pork barrel for 1915 in order to carry $12,000,000 demanded by the Mississippi River Commission for a wasteful levee system.

We protest against abrogating to engineers the constitutional power of Congress to determine where $20,000,000 is to go. Why not protest against an abrogation of our constitutional power to legislate for navigation, which appears to have been assumed by the second congress, and which encompasses every known interest apart from actual navigation that could be crowded into a pork barrel. All constitutional bars against such expenditures for local interests are now swept away. The battle cry of a Rivers and Harbors Congress, which controls the situation, is for $50,000,000 loot, irrespective of projects. Is it not a serious condition that should challenge the attention of thoughtful Members of Congress? A pressure for local projects has ever been instrumental in tying hands that otherwise would be raised against the pork barrel. Ninety-nine per cent of our people would protest against the barrel and the system behind it if these facts could be brought home to them. Yet they are to be called upon in 1915 to pay an inexcusable war tax for pork barrels. A congressional investigation would serve to give needed publicity, if made exhaustive. It would save many millions of dollars annually to our people, but more important from a legislative point of view, it would remove from a control of $50,000,000 annually an organization that has grown arrogant and powerful beyond comprehension, that gives its orders through its local members for Senators to stay on the job and work for the pork barrel; that collects unknown amounts of money from innocent contributors, paying 50 per cent collection fees in certain cases; an organization which has injected into pork-barrel legislation of former years an element of cheek and phenomenal nerve both astounding and wicked in its influence.

Until such an investigation can be had and until a change in the system of making appropriations for rivers and harbors is inaugurated, the pork barrel will thrive and grow and be a constant menace to the Federal Treasury.

HOW TO STOP PORK BARRELS.

The abolishment of pork-barrel legislation can be brought about by a strong advisory board of high-class men, to include Army and civil engineers and members of the Cabinet. This board ought to be appointed by the President and to have supervision of all waterways, making its annual recommendations to Congress in the same manner that Cabinet officials present their recommendations.

A board of this character would be opposed by this Rivers and Harbors Congress and many affiliated associations, because the usefulness of the second congress has not been directed toward developing legitimate navigation, but toward the accumulation of an annual $50,000,000 pork-barrel fund from out the Federal Treasury.

Good projects would be approved by a high-class board and worthless, wasteful projects discarded. These latter projects, and there are many of them, together with political pull, will join hands in opposing any change in the present disgraceful system.

Congress can cure a growing cancer only by using the surgeon's knife. Such cure would reduce the present heavy tax burdens and give many millions of dollars annually to legitimate governmental expenditures.

More important by far, such change in handling the waterway problem would make short shrift of the annual legislative curse which poisons all other legislation by its system of barter and trade and other influences with which it comes in contact.

We have smashed the 1914 barrel, or knocked it down into keg size, but in character it is still a generous sample of the larger barrel. Apart from the saving in funds, no permanent good has yet been accomplished. We must eliminate the gratuitous makers of the barrel—the Rivers and Harbors Congress—or, rather, the officials who assume to and who do exercise a vicious influence in determining the general character and amount of river and harbor appropriations. We have unconsciously abrogated powers possessed by the Federal Congress to this "Second Congress," powers that have been grossly abused. Let us place the power and responsibility in the hands of a high-class board which will command the confidence of the American Congress and of the country.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasant diversion to study the Members of a great body like this. Here we find the faithful public servant, the sincere economist, the sensational reformer, and the blatant demagogue.

It is the first two classes that dominate our membership, that transacts the public business, preserves the high standard of the House, and reflects credit upon the country.

The latter two classes are few in numbers, but conspicuously prominent by their frequency of speech and wildness of assertion. They ascribe unto themselves the virtues of the world and see no good in others. They win public favor through misrepresentation and hold it through false pretenses.

They play upon the ignorant and unwary, create a sentiment of suspicion and a feeling of unrest that breeds anarchy and makes socialists. They crave publicity and thirst for notoriety. Their entrance into public life is always a pity and their exit swift and sure.

The people of this country are fair and intelligent and will not be fooled. What they want from us is sincerity, not hypocrisy; action, not protestation; results, not criticism.

I hope my friend who has just taken his seat will not ascribe what I have said to himself.

I have been interested in his fight, delighted at his patriotism, astonished at his knowledge, amazed at his results.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] modestly takes credit for having assisted greatly in having this bill reduced from $43,000,000 to $20,000,000. For my part, if the gentleman thinks that to take $23,000,000 from the improvement of the great waterways of this country is a feather in his cap, then I say, "Take it and wear it where all the country may see it." And when, sir, you show it to your people, tell them that it is a prize that you have won for having affected the commerce that goes out of the harbors of this country, carrying the products of our soil and industries and bringing back the gold of the world.

Tell them that you have won it by preventing river improvements, thereby allowing the railroads of the country to continue to rob the consumers of the land by charging high and exorbitant freight rates.

Tell them that you have won it by preventing improvements on the Mississippi River, so that the rains that fall in your section and find outlet through the great river may in their mad rush to the sea sweep away the lives of my people and destroy their property. [Applause.]

I am afraid, though, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman's enthusiasm and love of the limelight has somewhat exaggerated in his own mind the result of his labors.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not the time. I wish that I could.

Mr. BUTLER. I am sure of that.

Mr. HARRISON. When this bill was up for consideration in the House and before it was emasculated in the Senate through filibustering tactics, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin apparently found no good in it and attempted to cure it of its defects and so-called "pork-barrel" symptoms by offering amendments to it. He had that right as a Member of this House, and his record on the bill then under consideration ought to reflect his true opinion of it; for I take it that he is that sincere and patriotic that he would certainly not sit here as a Member of this House, interested as he is against this so-called "pork-barrel" bill, and fail to endeavor to rid it of its many features that he considered objectionable by offering amendments to it. If there were objectionable features to it and he failed to exercise his right of offering amendments in order to rid the bill of them, the distinguished gentleman either confesses his ignorance of the subject or his unfaithfulness to his people. I am not willing to concede either, and I am sure that the gentleman will back me up in that statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after all his display of enthusiasm the sum total of all the amendments that he offered to the bill at that time amounted to $568,225. In other words, if every amendment he offered had been adopted the bill in the House would have been reduced from $43,289,004 to $42,720,779; and yet he terms it a pork-barrel bill and attempts to create the impression throughout the country that it is a pork-barrel bill.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not yield now.

Mr. FREAR. I just wanted to correct the gentleman's statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Why do I say that the gentleman attempts that? Because his actions in this House prove it. He thirsts for notoriety. He hungers for publicity. That is a disease, and many public men have it. It might well be called "resolutitis." Its symptoms are offering resolutions, criticizing somebody or something, alleging sensational happenings in order to get in the public prints, and then allowing the resolutions to die.

On May 4, 1914, the distinguished gentleman was attacked with this malady. He offered a 10-page resolution, citing many whereases with respect to river and harbor improvements, and asked the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House to allow the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Department of Commerce to pass on rivers and harbors appropriations.

That was the last of that resolution, but it answered its purpose. He got his name in the papers.

On August 25 following he had a relapse of the disease and offered another resolution, containing 11 pages, which went to the Committee on Rules, reciting many whereases and asking the Judiciary Committee of the House to investigate the action of the Senate in increasing the House rivers and harbors bill by $10,000,000 and to report to Congress their findings and recommendations—certainly an unusual action to be placed on the Judiciary Committee. That resolution has not since been heard of, but it served its purpose. He got his name in the papers.

Two days afterwards another resolution was offered by the gentleman and referred to the Committee on Rules asking the Appropriations Committee of the House to report to Congress whether an urgency existed for enacting a wasteful rivers and harbors bill—certainly a great question for a great committee to pass upon. That resolution went the way of the others, but served its purposes. He got his name in the papers.

On August 29 the gentleman offered another resolution asking the Judiciary Committee of the House to bring before it the officers and directors of the Atlantic & Gulf Coast Dredge Owners' Association to ascertain what efforts have been exerted to secure rivers and harbors legislation in the past. That resolution died, but answered its purpose.

Two days later he introduced another resolution asking the Judiciary Committee to investigate the general character of the Rivers and Harbors Congress and ascertain whether it is a first or second congress in its influence, and to report, as he says—> the exact nature of the constitutional obligations and duties of all individuals who are active officials in both congresses and who are attempting to serve both bodies in a dual capacity.

That resolution died but it answered its purpose.

On September 2, again on September 3, and again on September 17 he introduced resolutions along similar lines, calling for investigations, with like purposes and like results.

The gentleman is certainly easily satisfied and content with the mere introduction of resolutions, for none of them have been considered or reported on by the committees, and, I am advised, have never been insisted on by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. Speaker, it may be excusable for Representatives to mislead an unsuspecting public by the mere introduction of verbose resolutions filled with sensational charges and misrepresentations. In time the public will judge that the author of such resolutions is either playing them for idiots or has not sufficient influence to have his resolutions considered.

It may be justifiable in some instances for Representatives to extend their remarks in the RECORD in order that the public may get the benefit of their views. But there is no excuse or justification for a Member of this House to extend his remarks in the RECORD by directly or indirectly criticizing the public services or private actions of his colleagues.

And yet the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, in order to catch the headlines of the sensational press, through the courtesies extended him by this House on June 3 to extend his remarks in the RECORD, saw fit to violate that courtesy, and made references to Members of this House and the other body as chief beneficiaries of this river and harbor legislation, and that they were influenced by certain special interests. That was the purport of his remarks.

I merely mention this to show how fair and open the gentleman is in his mad thirst for distinction and notoriety.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRISON. You may oppose the Ransdell-Humphreys bill, you may disagree with the authors of that bill in their fight for the waterways of this country, but you can never lessen the high regard and respect of those who know the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and my colleague in this House [Mr. HUMPHREYS] for their faithful, splendid, and patriotic public services. [Applause.]

They have been here too long and have served their people too faithfully and are known by this body too well for one who has yet much to learn and little to forget to unjustly, through the extension of his remarks, criticize them. [Applause.]

Much has been said and written about the rivers and harbors bill being a "pork-barrel" bill. This is unfair to the improvements of the great waterways of this country. There are, no doubt, some items in the rivers and harbors bill that passed this House this year, as there are probably in every rivers and harbors bill that has passed Congress, that are not meritorious. But I do not believe there is any bill that passes this House that is better safeguarded than the rivers and harbors bill. What other bill is there that before an appropriation is made must first be recommended by experts?

It was the present Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] who is responsible for the emasculation of the present bill in the Senate, who caused the establishment of the present system. It was on his bill and his motion that the Board of Army Engineers for Rivers and Harbors was first created, and the law so written that appropriations be made only on their recommendation.

And I do not believe there is any branch of the public service so competent and efficient in their particular line of work and as free from outside influence as the Board of Army Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. They are men of the highest character and splendid qualifications for their work. [Applause.]

They hold their offices for life, and they are not personally interested in any of the projects they are called to pass upon. How could a bill be made up with less pork-barrel qualities in it than when it is made up on the recommendation of such an array of expert talent? The present bill as it left the House was made up of items on the recommendation of the Army board.

And yet, because my people and my district are so fortunate as to be favored by nature with harbors and rivers that need to be improved and maintained, and because, forsooth, the Board of Army Engineers should recommend their improvement that the people of all the country might increase their commerce and trade with foreign nations, and when I insist upon the improvements so recommended by that board, I am to be accused of trying to get pork and my district penalized. It is but natural and right that Congressmen and Senators who represent districts blessed with rivers and harbors should see that the Federal Government make reasonable appropriations for their improvement and maintenance.

Because one Representative might obtain a larger appropriation than another in the rivers and harbors bill is no reason why he should be criticized. Appropriations are made in most instances as they ought to be, according to the necessities and demands of the district, without respect to the Congressman who represents that district.

Why is it that when a Member here obtains an appropriation for some worthy project for the District of Columbia he is not styled a "pork-barrel Congressman"? Ah, sirs, it is because it is an appropriation not for his immediate constituents. But when one represents faithfully those who send him here and he obtains for them their proper recognition, then he must be criticized.

There is little "pork" in this bill; and I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and those others who may style the rivers and harbors bill as the "pork-barrel measure," that the accusation would just as well lie against many other bills that are brought in here, notably the pension bill. None of that appropriation goes into my section; but I would be unworthy of the commission I hold if I should refuse to vote for a just pension bill. I believe the men who fought to preserve the Union ought to have reasonable pensions if they are in need of them; but I want to say to the gentleman that because you have many of them in your district and I have none in mine, and when you may fight for them I might say that that was "pork" as much as you can say, because in the rivers and harbors bill I have a provision for my rivers and for my harbors, that that is "pork."

Why, sirs, when the gentleman from Wisconsin says that we are trying to waste the people's money in this bill and are pork-barrel statesmen, I commend to his consideration the fact that no Member of this House has shown more zeal and activity in tying to take money from the Public Treasury for his own district than he. Not content with his constituents abiding by the general pension laws and proving their claims for pensions under its provisions, why, I notice that during his short service here he has introduced 18 special private pension bills for his constituents, ranging in amounts from $12 to $60 a month. [Applause.]

If the gentleman had some rivers and harbors in his district, certainly at that rate he would soon be styled the champion pork-barrel statesman in Congress.

But that is not all. I notice that for the little town of Rice Lake, in his district, where 3,968 people live, he has introduced a bill to take from the Federal Treasury $75,000 to erect a public building there. [Applause.] And, again, I notice that in the little town of Hudson, in his district, where only 2,810 people live, he has introduced a bill to erect at the Government's expense a post office to cost $75,000. [Applause.]

Ah, sirs, the gentleman in his display for economy blows hot and cold It is a case of whose ox is gored.

It comes with poor grace for the gentleman from Wisconsin to fight pork in the rivers and harbors bill when he is trying to get all he can out of the public-buildings bill and for pensions for his constituents.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask to whom the gentleman is referring?

Mr. HARRISON. To the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Now, Mr. Speaker, one other thought and I am through. I notice that the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] recently gave out this statement to the press; I will read it:

> Representative TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, a Republican member of the committee, suggested the advisability of a still further cut in the appropriation, making it $5,000,000. He said climatic conditions were such that very little work could be done in the North, and declared that such meritorious projects as the Boston Channel and New York Harbor could not be benefited by the small appropriation. The entire expenditure, he said, would probably be made in the South. He will fight the bill on the floor of the House.

I can not believe that the gentleman from Massachusetts, whom I admire and whose judgment I respect, who is always fair and broad-minded, could have made such a statement.

Surely he would not measure legislative action for the waterways of this country by geographical lines or length of seasons. That would be too unlike the gentleman. This Congress certainly has shown no partiality to the South, and if because we can work better in the winter on our rivers and harbors than they can in Maine, Massachusetts, or Washington, then that ought to appeal to the gentleman's high sense of justice and be a matter of felicitation to him rather than sorrow, if we adopt this article as the gentleman's view. Under the same rule of reasoning, if the gentleman's section had perpetual winter and we had perpetual summer, he would not then, of course, be in favor of any rivers and harbors legislation.

I hope the gentleman has been misquoted and that this apparent feeling of partisanship or sectionalism is not true.

I recently voted, and did it with pleasure, for an appropriation for the fire sufferers of Salem, in the gentleman's own State. I voted for two Members from his State to go on the great Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the gentleman and his colleague [Mr. MURRAY], and in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I want to say, since my good friend and colleague [Mr. MURRAY] retires from this great committee and Congress to-morrow to take up a high office in the city of Boston, that we all regret to see him leave. No man has ever retired from this House that I hold in higher esteem and friendship than BILL MURRAY. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, with only one exception, and that one Pennsylvania, your State of Massachusetts is the only State of the Union that has two men on that committee. Has the South played sectionalism or partisanship with your section? I say no; and the gentleman knows that we have not, and I hope that he will join in for the immediate passage of this bill that will mean so much for the improvement of the waterways of this section and to the people of every part of this country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] consume some of his time now?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to speak to the amendment which I have offered. My colleague [Mr. GALLIVAN], the new Member from Boston, who now has the task of solely representing that great city in this body—I am glad to say with skill, ability, and capacity [applause on the Democratic side]—has referred in his remarks to the possibility of this amendment being offered. It is offered to protect the interests of the second greatest shipping port in our great land.

We have in Boston Harbor to-day a channel of 35 feet in depth, and all the interests in New England have been especially anxious that that project should be continued and made 40 feet in depth rather than 35 feet. The gentleman representing part of the city of Boston, or, as I say, all of it here to-day, has explained some of the reasons why that should be continued; and if there is any money to be expended on river and harbor work during the next six months, it seems to me that the great ports of the cities of Boston and New York ought to be first considered.

The mayor of the city of New York and many of the leading citizens of that city appeared before our committee urging to be done in New York Harbor work that, if not now done, would seriously interfere with some of their local projects. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] introduced a bill which had the support of the entire New York City delegation, and which was adopted by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. In constructing the new and direct rapid-transit tube from Brooklyn to the city hall, New York, it is necessary to remove Coenties Reef, and this is certainly an urgent need of the great city of New York.

Consequently it seems to me no more than right and fair that the word "existing" should be stricken out of the amendment which we are considering here to-day, in order that such great works as the two to which I have referred can be undertaken at this time.

I regret to be obliged to differ from the members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, with whom I have had such pleasant associations during the present session and for whom I have such high personal regard; nor am I able to submit to the will of the majority of the committee and accept the vote they passed in favor of reporting the Senate amendment.

Returning to a consideration of the bill under discussion, I am very glad, indeed, that my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] was kind enough to read a statement purporting to have come from me. I do not deny it; and I am glad that I have opportunity to admit that I made very nearly the statement which he read to this House, because it seems to me that he, when he talks about the beauties of the southern winters and the rigors of the northern winters, shows very clearly the justification of the statement that I made. This is absolutely true: That outside of a very small amount of money which will be used for maintenance of existing projects every dollar additional must be expended in the South. I am not a sectionalist. I will take credit of being what he says—a little broader than a sectional man. But reference has been made here on this floor during this debate to sectionalism and partisanship. It is mighty nice, gentlemen, not to talk these things openly, just because you have the power to enforce them with your votes over our heads. Time and again votes have been passed during this session greatly to the advantage of the Southern States. We on this side will not talk of sectionalism or partisanship when we have the same chances that you gentlemen on that side of the aisle now have, but we have not got them at this time nor have we the same chance in this bill.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sorry I can not yield; but my time is very limited and, of course, a member of the committee can get time. The gentleman also says that we have been very well treated in the existing bill. I do not know just what he means by that, but I have taken occasion to look up what the original bill was. I suppose he was referring to the bill as it passed the House, not the bill under discussion here to-day. I have taken occasion to look up the difference between the appropriations made for the North and for the South, and I find that, including in the northern items the appropriations for the Ohio River—which are over $5,000,000—in the North, with all the great amount of commerce in the cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, San Francisco, Seattle, and so on, and with all the great commerce on the Lakes carried in the bill as it passed the House, we had $19,000,000, whereas our southern friends had in that bill $23,000,000. As I say, the $19,000,000 included $5,000,000 for the Ohio River, as the following computation of the appropriations carried in the bill will show:

So that while we may have been as fairly treated as our proportionate votes here on the floor——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield to the chairman of the committee, surely.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will not ask it, because I know the gentleman's time is limited.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, I do not care to deal with the phase of the question very extensively, but I do want to call attention to the fact that the bill which we have under consideration here to-day is not the bill that is being supported by the gentlemen who have talked in its behalf. Our very able chairman [Mr. SPARKMAN] said, in effect, that the lump-sum appropriation abrogates the legislative function of this body. The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] admitted in the very beginning of his remarks that this bill was bad legislation. He used those very words. Now, I for one do not intend to be shackled by any threat from any other branch of our Government that if we do not pass this legislation we can not get any bill at all. [Applause.] How do we know that? Let us pass a good bill. Let us pass a bill that is based on reason and common sense, and then, if some other body does not see fit to accept it, all well and good—the blame is not on us.

After this bill had been under consideration for months in another branch, one day an amendment was voted down, and a little later some other gentleman made the same identical proposition in order, as the RECORD shows, to avoid a night session and keeping the Members up all night. I can not believe that such a bill as that is the only kind of a bill that one of the greatest legislative bodies in the world will consider and pass. I will not agree that we must accept the bill as it has come from the Senate or not have any bill. As conditions now are, after the long lapse of time since the House passed the original bill on March 26, and in view of the fact that winter is coming on, I heartily agree to the amendment proposed by the ranking Republican member of the committee, which provides that the bill should be absolutely limited in its amount to maintenance and prevention of waste. What logic is there in coming here one day and saying that the Treasury is getting bankrupt, and that we must reach down into the pockets of the people and provide the Treasury with $105,000,000 more revenue to prevent going bankrupt and not being able to pay our bills—what kind of logic is there, I say, when we take that step and the very next day or two after pass the next appropriation measure that comes up including $15,000,000 more than is required?

If that is Democratic logic, I am glad I am something of a partisan to-day, and that I shall vote for the partisan amendment—call it so, if you please—proposed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. I am not willing to go before the people of my district and tell them that I was one of those who voted $15,000,000 out of the Treasury of our Government when the President himself says that we are in need of new forms of revenue. I want to call attention to one phrase in the Senate amendment which it does not seem to me has received very much consideration; that is in the lines omitted in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]:

For the prosecution of such projects, heretofore authorized, as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation and most economical and advantageous in the execution of the work.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] says that I show sectionalism when I do not accept that kind of a phrase. Here it is the first of October. It will be the first of November before any work can be done under this bill if it is passed. Still the gentleman thinks that we of the North ought to stand for that kind of a phrase being adopted by this Congress, when it is practically impossible to do any of the desired kind of work in the northern section of our country during the period which will intervene between now and the time another measure can be prepared. It is therefore perfectly evident that, excepting the item of maintenance, every dollar of this money will be expended in the South. I was very glad to vote for the original bill. I have no apologies for so voting. I, as a member of the committee, scrutinized very carefully the items with which I was most familiar, namely, those in New England and possibly in New York. As I knew that those were worthy projects, I was perfectly willing to rely upon the judgment of the chairman and of my colleagues on the committee that the items wherein they were especially interested were likewise worthy projects. But since that time there has come a large volume of criticism of that bill, and certain projects have been shown to be not as worthy as others. I do not think it is very becoming of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to devote four-fifths of his speech to criticizing the Member of the House who may have been more responsible than any other one man for uniting public opinion and fixing public thought on those extravagances.

A very serious objection to the bill before this House is the fact that the appropriation is to be made in a "lump sum." As the chairman of the committee has stated, we abrogate our legislative functions and turn them over to the Board of Engineers. This board was severely criticized during the debate in the Senate, but notwithstanding this, either from haste in preparation of the final bill or not being able to agree upon projects for which the particular amount was to be expended, the lump sum was voted and is before us to-day. No pretense of an effort is made to allot this amount upon any equitable basis or in accordance with the merits of the various projects. We can easily see the wild scramble among influential Democrats to be the first ones to reach the office of the engineers after this bill passes. The precedent about to be established will surely be a source of trouble in the future. A far better plan is to provide for maintenance only at this time, and next winter prepare a bill that will adequately care for the necessary river and harbor improvements.

Let us not pass this bill to-day. Let us pass the substitute offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], and then see whether or not the other branch of Congress will accept a fair, a reasonable, and an economical measure rather than insist, as some Members on the floor have stated, that unless we take their bill there will be no bill at all. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the State of New York is as much interested in river and harbor improvements as any State in the Union, and I think I am putting it very modestly when I say that. It pays 20 per cent of the bills for all the river and harbor improvements in the country, as estimated by experts who have given the matter attention. Of course, no one knows the exact proportion of the taxes that come from the people of any State, but about 20 per cent come from the State of New York. We have in New York real rivers that do not stand in need of any artificial irrigation, and real harbors where there is commerce.

There is one improvement in the State of New York, in the East River, that should appeal to every man interested in commerce. I understand that the initiation of that improvement was provided for in the original bill. We have an improvement in the upper Hudson River made necessary and essential for the full benefit of the people of the West of the $102,000,000 improvement that we are putting on the Erie Canal. The Erie Canal runs through my district from one end to the other, and branches of it run out into nearly every part of the district, connecting some of the inland lakes with the navigation of the canal. So that my people are interested in the improvement of the terminal of this great waterway.

But when I enlist for economy in expenditures of the National Government I am willing to forego for the time being the improvement that my constituents are interested in, uniting for the general good. I want to do everything I can to remove the shadow of an excuse for any part of the unjust and odorous and burdensome taxation that you are proposing now to put upon the people of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] You can do it by economical administration. I have in my hand the daily report of the Treasury Department for the 26th of September, Saturday last. I find that for the portion of the fiscal year 1915 ending on the 26th of September the total ordinary disbursements, the net ordinary disbursements, after deducting the unexpended balance, was $192,803,285.53. That is for this fiscal year 1915 up to date last Saturday from the 1st day of July.

I find in the next column the disbursements a year ago for the same period were $183,317,254.87. In other words, the disbursements for this last three months exceed the disbursements of a year ago for the same period by $9,586,030.66. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is pretty near $10,000,000, and it is safe to say it will be $10,000,000 on the 30th day of this month. Ten million dollars for the first quarter in excess of expenditures! Do you see at what rate you are going—$40,000,000 a year more than last year, without any river and harbor bill this year, and with a river and harbor bill last year? Where will the end come if you go on with this extravagance of expenditure and extravagance of appropriation?

I want to begin right here at home. I want to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Washington cutting the bill down to $5,000,000. I would like to see it become a law in that respect. It is more important that we relieve the people of this country from additional taxation than it is to run the risk of wasting this money on improvements that never ought to be undertaken, or, if they ought to be, can wait a little while until the commerce and business of the country catch up to the improvements already made. Cut this appropriation down; set an example to the Executive of this country. Let the President call his Cabinet together and take into careful consideration the question of how much they can lop off of the appropriations already made for the expenses of this year. A careful executive in each department, careful officials, can cut off a little here and a little there without crippling the service. Why should it not be done?

Oh, you gentlemen agonize about taking the "people's money" when you get out on the stump. You will have to cut that out of your speeches this fall. [Applause on the Republican side.] After having voted for this unjust, inexcusable tax bill of last week, how are you going to meet your constituents? I am holding out something for you to meet them with. Tell them that you cut down the appropriations, even if you did wait until the last moment on the last bill, and that you tried to do the best you could. Tell them that you set an example to the Executive whereby he might cut down something of this extravagant expenditure. Be something besides a rubber stamp here in Congress. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Do not follow where you are led blindly, for fear you will fall into the ditch all together. Do your own thinking, have your own independence, have courage sufficient to carry to the other end of the Capitol, lest you lack the courage to get back home before election day and meet your constituents that will have to pay the bills.

Why should we not pass this amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington? Why should we not insist upon it? The Senate, you say, will not agree to it. They will if you stand firm. The Senate is no more than mortal. I know some of you think they are. You pass undigested legislation under a rule or a gag law, without consideration, without hearings from the opposition. It goes to the Senate, and they have debate. There are two parties in the Senate, and one does not override the other. I used to talk about the Senate rules and thought that they ought to have something whereby they could bring an end to debate; that we ought to have rules here where we could do business. Well, when I see how our rules can be abused and how the rules in the Senate can be used to give a chance for debate and discussion; when I have seen improvements written on bill after bill that you have sent over there, coming back far from perfect, and yet how much better than when they left here, I can not but believe that the Senate rules are a good deal nearer right than the House rules are, especially under a Democratic Congress. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

You started out with the idea, and the Executive seems to share it, that this was a Democratic administration and that nobody but Democrats should have anything to say. You did not appreciate the good, honest criticism that might come to you from the other side. You thought everything was perfect when it was sent to you. [Applause on the Republican side.] You did not even have to think about it. You said, "Yes; I am for it," and voted that way. It would have been a great deal better if you had started out at the beginning of the extra session with an appreciation of the criticism made against your bill from a different viewpoint and weighed it carefully. You would have stood a good deal better now before the country than you do if you had done that, and you would have had better legislation, and you would have had better chances for your future salvation if you had done that. Gentlemen, vote once for economy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make that request for all gentlemen who speak on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, after the close of the discussion I may have no objection to that, but for the present I object.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, when a highwayman meets you on the road and points a pistol at your head, and you are unarmed and defenseless, the only sane thing to do is to throw up your hands and surrender. That is the situation here in regard to this river and harbor bill. It has been the victim of a legislative holdup. Its friends are powerless to hit back, and there is nothing for us to do except to accept the Senate amendment. If there were any other course open with impunity, I would never vote for that Senate amendment, because I regard it as absolutely wrong in principle and utterly inadequate in amount. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] criticizes the Senate amendment to the river and harbor bill for the reason that he says that in all likelihood a large amount of it will be expended on the improvement of the Mississippi River and other southern streams. Other gentlemen have risen and have objected to the bill because some of this money may be used in the building of levees on the Mississippi. I desire to call the attention of my Republican colleagues to a plank in the Republican national platform of 1912, which reads as follows:

> The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States and the Dominion of Canada, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many million acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope, and the disasters they produce seriously affect the general welfare. The States unaided can not cope with this giant problem. Hence we believe the Federal Government should assume a fair proportion of the burden of its control so as to prevent the disasters from recurring floods.

The Mississippi River is the only river that is mentioned in the Republican national platform, and now when it is likely that a considerable amount of money will be expended upon this project, which is indorsed by the Republican Party, some gentlemen want to squeal. I for one propose to take my medicine. I think that our platform, as a distinguished man once said, means something, "that it is not molasses to catch flies, and that it means business." Objection has been made because some large amount of this money may be expended upon one of the single projects referred to in this Senate amendment. What is the objection to that? Has not every project referred to in the Senate amendment been passed upon by the Board of Engineers? Has it not been passed upon by this House, existing projects and those that are authorized? Do we not intend to prosecute each of these projects to completion at some future time? Are they not all worthy?

After the Senate had thrashed around for seven or eight months they cut out all of the new projects, but they did not cut out, as I understand it, a single one of the projects under construction and those already authorized. So they have the stamp of approval of the Senate. There is a certain estimate made for each one of these improvements, and the money will not be wasted if $20,000,000 are expended on the Mississippi or if $20,000,000 are expended on the Ohio River alone, although we do not anticipate there will be that much spent on the Ohio; only perhaps a million or two million dollars. But how could the money be wasted? The canalization of the Ohio River is estimated to cost about $64,000,000. Of course, there can not be expended $20,000,000 on the Ohio River during the next three or four winter months. But if it could be done there would be just that much less work to be performed on this project at some future time.

Some gentlemen talk as though these twenty million of dollars were to be expended in the next two or three or four months. I doubt whether very much of it will be expended then, but it will continue to be available through next spring and summer and fall. What objection is there to appropriating a lump sum for specified projects, all of which have been passed upon by the Board of Engineers? If we were making these appropriations for each specific project, we would be guided in the main by what the engineers say they can expend on this particular project for the next 2 or 3 or 10 months.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to another proposition. It seems there is another plank in the Democratic national platform that is about to be shattered. If you will read their platform, long and voluminous, you will find that it says, in effect, that the Democratic Party is not going to take any backward step in river and harbor improvements the country over, and specifies the Mississippi River, and even the drainage of the lands in the Mississippi Delta.

But, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of some gentlemen who have been criticizing this bill and who think that they have raised such a furor over the country that there will be no river and harbor appropriations in the future, I desire to say that on the 25th of August last, after this filibuster had been started against the river and harbor appropriation bill in the Senate, three political parties met in convention in the city of Columbus, Ohio. The Progressive Party declared that it favored "the speedy completion of the Ohio River improvement project." The Republican Party also met in convention on the 25th of August and it declared in favor of the river and harbor improvements, as follows:

> We urge Congress to make liberal and regular appropriations to complete the improvement of the Ohio River.

The Democratic Party in convention assembled in Ohio kept silent upon this proposition, but there is a good reason, likely, for that. The Democratic Congress had repudiated one plank of their platform of 1912 and it had ignored many others and had failed to fulfill in many respects its pledges pertaining to its platform.

This Democratic Congress was still in session, and I take it the Democratic Party in convention in Columbus, not knowing what sort of an antic the Democratic Congress would cut next, kept silent, not only in reference to saying anything about the Ohio River, but never mentioned the Democratic national platform of 1912. But, regardless of this silence on the part of the Democrats of Ohio, I desire to say that I believe they are all in favor of the speedy completion of the canalization of the Ohio River. I know that the Democrats who live in the Ohio Valley are just as earnest and active in the movement to bring about these results as the Republican Members.

Now, I feel that if we can not get the whole loaf of $43,000,000 we started out with in March, which I believe we ought to have, we ought to take the next thing to it, nearly a half a loaf. It is better sometimes to compromise. For instance, the work on numerous locks and dams in the Ohio River, some 15 or 20 now under process of construction or authorized to be commenced, on which I understand by the language of this bill this money can be used, would be greatly retarded if we failed to pass something like a $20,000,000 appropriation. The $20,000,000, as I understand, will only about cover $10,000,000 which will be expended on projects which are now being prosecuted by Government plants and about $2,500,000 in the maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and $7,500,000 to carry out the work under private contract. I regret, as much as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the other gentlemen who have spoken, to abdicate my power as a legislator or as a member of the committee, but when the President appeared here on the 4th of September and personally notified us that a deficit stared him in the face in our revenues, that there was a possibility we might soon have an empty Treasury, and recommended the levying of a war tax in time of peace, that moment the river and harbor bill as it passed the House was doomed. I do not give the credit for the defeat of the river and harbor bill to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]; I attribute it to the President of the United States and the failure of the Underwood tariff bill to produce sufficient revenues to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Since the President's address on the 4th of September last there has been a great cry for economy on the part of Congress, and in response to this demand the Senate cut the House bill as amended by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate from $53,683,004 to $20,000,000. It seems to me that this is a sufficient retrenchment on the annual appropriation for rivers and harbors, and which is so badly needed for numerous projects upon which work is now being done.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the question as to whether or not the river and harbor measure shall be defeated in its passage on account of the condition of the Treasury, due to war conditions, is one question, and the question as to whether this bill shall be defeated and blacklisted, as it were, upon the ground that it contains items without merit in such large numbers as to subject it to the charge of being a "pork-barrel" measure, in the offensive sense of that term, is another and entirely different question. Upon this latter proposition I desire to offer a few remarks, but before doing so I desire to say I was somewhat amused at the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], to which I wish to make a brief reference. As is his custom while purporting to discuss a nonpolitical subject, he drifted into political affairs. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] preaches to us a lecture on economy in connection with this particular class of legislation. If I were disposed to drift into politics as he has, I might reply to him by calling his attention to the fact that in 1896, when the Treasury was empty and when the Cleveland administration was being compelled to issue tens and hundreds of millions of dollars of bonds, a large river and harbor bill passed a Republican House, went to the President, was vetoed upon the ground—and the most urgent ground—of economy, and the gentlemen on the other side, disregarding every consideration of economy, then in control of the House, rose in their might and passed that bill over his veto.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did Mr. PAYNE vote for that bill over the President's veto at that time?

Mr. HULL. I have no desire to do the gentleman an injustice; I do not know.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is safe to say the gentleman did.

Mr. HULL. I am advised that he did. In 1899, when the Spanish War emergency legislation was pending, the Republican side was in control of the House. Now, the emergency legislation, together with bond issues and the calculated increase in customs receipts, gave to the Treasury within one fiscal year about $300,000,000 in additional taxes. During that first year, as I recall, the gentlemen in charge of the House voted between $15,000,000 and $16,000,000 of river and harbor appropriations. In 1899, $23,000,000 for rivers and harbors, not to mention public buildings, were voted. We heard no suggestion of economy then except on the Democratic side. Now, without pursuing that subject further, I wish to say that the present administration during its brief existence has had many difficult and urgent questions to solve. In my judgment it has met and solved those that have been thus far disposed of in a manner most satisfactory to the American people, and I have no doubt that upon the question of public expenditures, when I view the Democratic record in all the States and in the General Government during former years, it will be but a very short time when the question of a system of sound and economical expenditures in the General Government will be worked out and put into operation by this administration. Upon the other question gentlemen have referred to, if there be any gentleman who has been exploiting this bill for mere publicity, I could tell him how he could get much more publicity by exerting his efforts along another line. A few years ago a notable commission reported, as I recall—and I do not wish to be incorrect—that the magazines and other like publications were receiving some $50,000,000 subsidy from the Government through the mail service. Now, if the same gentleman wants publicity, and is sincere about economy, he can get all the publicity he is looking for by attacking that proposition.

Mr. Speaker, as a Member of this House, I have always welcomed and urged the closest scrutiny of every item of appropriation, and do so now; but this haphazard, ignorant, careless, negligent criticism, for filibustering purposes, often does a serious injustice to an item in an important bill. I now have in mind one relating to the Cumberland River. The gentleman who now belongs to another body, but who was at one time chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House, recently engaged in a lengthy filibuster against this measure. During that time he referred to this particular river, the Cumberland, in the States of Kentucky and Tennessee—and I refer to it because I happen to have personal knowledge of the actual facts pertaining to the merits of that stream—the gentleman who made this lengthy filibuster and who uttered innumerable charges against this river, in most instances did not touch the important facts. He even went so far as to offer sweeping and damaging charges and reflections against the Department of Engineers, notwithstanding he had been their champion in this House almost for 15 years, notwithstanding he was the author of the provision creating the Board of Engineers, and has stood on this floor year after year and defended them for their fairness, their efficiency, the accuracy of their judgment, and their ability as engineers. Yet, when he comes to a river in the course of this filibuster and he seeks to destroy a project and is unable to find sufficient facts on which to base even a reasonable charge, he turns his attention to the engineers and grossly reflects upon the fairness and freedom from bias of those gentlemen. He even imputes to them such weakness as to render them subject to undue influence on the part of Members of Congress. He even charged, or strongly intimated, that the Department of Engineers had reported that a certain section of the upper Cumberland River was not worthy of improvement "at the present time," and that within 14 months, through congressional influence, they reversed that opinion and made a favorable report. He goes further than that and strongly hints they did this without any further direction, either from Congress or from the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Now, all these statements or intimations are absolutely untrue. I can not think that the gentleman had any particular intention of assassinating, as it were, a meritorious river proposition, but for filibustering purposes during his enthusiasm he became seized with such a spirit of recklessness that he was ready to go to such extremes and lengths as to attempt to injure in a measure the reputation that these splendid engineers have built up by a lifetime of honest, earnest work in their department. I want to say that I have been coming in contact with those gentlemen for many years, and while I have often been overruled in my contentions and have often been almost provoked by adverse rulings, I can say in all candor that I have not appeared before any court in my State or section that was harder to move on a question of fact than the Department of Engineers have been difficult to move on what I considered a highly meritorious state of facts in support of a waterway improvement. The truth as to the favorable report in this case is that only three Congressmen and two business men were present in December, 1912, when the discovery of double the amount of reported commerce changed the attitude of the board.

Now, this illustrates, Mr. Speaker, in a striking manner the rank injustice that is done by indiscriminate criticism of items embraced in a comprehensive appropriation bill, such as the pending river and harbor bill. There is no more meritorious item in this bill than the upper Cumberland River. I would join with any gentleman who is anxious to practice economy in the light of our war conditions in putting this bill into conference and letting it go over until a later period [applause], but I do not propose to stand here and seemingly admit, if a majority of this House should adopt the pending Senate substitute resolution, that a single charge or a single statement derogatory to different items in this measure that were not based upon the facts—and most of them were not—should be taken as confessed. I think that it ought to be thoroughly agreed that if the House should adopt the Senate substitute amendment, it is without prejudice to these new projects and it is with the distinct understanding that there is no concession as to the soundness or truthfulness of most of the charges that have been carelessly and recklessly and indiscriminately made against items in the pending House measure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose the Senate amendment for the reason that if the rivers and harbors bill as passed by the House is a "pork-barrel" bill, then this Senate amendment is nothing more nor nothing less than a "pork-barrel" measure. I shall not go on record as supporting any measure that has any "pork" in it.

The item in the bill as passed by the House carrying an appropriation for that section of the Mississippi River that bounds the district which I have the honor to represent has no "pork" in it. The cities of Granite City and East St. Louis, two great industrial centers, are menaced by the Mississippi River in times of high water, and great damage has been done there in the past by the high waters. A few years of the destruction wrought by the Mississippi River would many times pay for this appropriation, and it would relieve in a great measure any future trouble of this nature. East St. Louis is a city of 80,000 people, and Granite and her sister cities add 30,000 more people that need this protection. These people have experienced the floods in the past, and I want to go on record for the appropriation carried in the bill passed by the House for that part of the Mississippi River touching my district as one of urgent need and necessity for the lives and property of the cities of East St. Louis and Granite City. Under the laws of the State of Illinois the people in this part of my district have expended $6,500,000 for protection from the Mississippi River. They are now taxed to the limit, and it seems to me the Government should assist them in the meritorious work they have started for the saving of life and property from the Mississippi River during times of high water.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 7, after the word "improvement," insert: "And provided further, That of the $20,000,000 herein appropriated, $750,000 shall be applied to the improvement of the Hudson River by continuing the construction of the lock and dam at Troy, N. Y."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I assume that this conference report will be adopted, but out of fairness to the State of New York I ask that you accept the amendment that I have just proposed, because upon the completion of the improvements of the Hudson River at Troy depends the efficiency of the Barge Canal, which is being built at an expense of $201,000,000, which enormous sum is being raised by the taxpayers of the State of New York without one cent of Government aid.

It is a well-known fact that the barges from the Erie Canal and the Champlain Canal will be unable to proceed down the Hudson River unless the work of constructing the dam at Troy and deepening the channel below is completed, and completed simultaneously with those two great projects. You are appropriating $20,000,000 for river and harbor improvements to be left entirely to the discretion of the engineers, with no guaranty or recommendation that any particular improvement or work be continued. In answer to my question, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN], chairman of the committee, said that he presumed that the work at Troy would be continued.

All that I ask you to do is to insert a provision in this bill that will make it mandatory for that work to be continued. It seems to me eminently unfair to the great State of New York, that must pay at least 20 per cent of the $20,000,000, that it should be left in any doubt regarding the continuance of this work, which is absolutely essential to the carrying out of the canal scheme. The gentleman asks why the State of New York does not do this work itself, and let me say in answer that he must know that the Hudson River at that point is a navigable stream; therefore it is entirely under the jurisdiction of the United States Government. We of the State of New York are as powerless to help ourselves as though this project was located in the center of the Atlantic Ocean.

Again I appeal to you in all fairness to allow this amendment to pass, not as a matter of charity or as a matter of showing your good will toward the State of New York, but simply and solely as a matter of common justice, to insure the completion of one of the greatest projects of modern times, and not leave the completion of this project to the whims and caprices of any board of engineers, regardless of how able they may be.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER. I will.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. On what do you predicate your figures of $750,000?

Mr. PARKER. On the item in the original copy of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. The House bill?

Mr. PARKER. The House bill. And I think the item was made up by the Engineers. The work on the dam is now going on. There is no question but that the Government intends to complete the work.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, some minutes since I had hoped to have 10 minutes or more in which to speak about the merits of this proposition that has come over from the Senate, but pressure for time by the Members has impelled me to take less and to curtail my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House have heard something to-day of the splendid waterways meeting held in New York last week, so ably presided over by our colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], and which has done so much for the improvement of the Nation's navigable waters.

I had the privilege of attending its first day's session and of hearing the able young mayor of New York City, Mr. John Purroy Mitchel, in his cordial address of welcome, plead for the needs of that great port.

He spoke strongly in favor of all the improvements appropriated for in this bill as it passed the House, but especially of the East River project, which I had the honor of fathering in this Congress. This stream, which carries annually 45,000,000 tons, and for which my bill had an item of $500,000 to remove some rocks, and especially those at Coenties and Corlears Reefs.

The first named lies directly over a proposed tunnel about to be built by the city in the extension of its great passenger traffic system.

Until these rocks are removed nothing can be done and the project is held up. Immediate action should be had by the Government, first to improve this important and useful river; secondly, to enable the city authorities to proceed with its necessary rapid-transit plans. The arguments of Mayor Mitchel should be heeded. The Hudson and Harlem Rivers, two navigable streams, carrying 72,000,000 and 15,000,000 tons, respectively, each year, will be in danger of being cut out by the adoption of the conference report. The State of New York last year agreed to appropriate $1,000,000 to secure the right of way for a much-needed improvement in the last-named stream at Johnston's Iron Works. The port of New York badly needs the completion of such important waterways as the Bronx River and Westchester and Eastchester Creeks, now under construction, and of the deepening and widening of the Bronx Kills, an improvement recommended by Gen. Newton in 1874, and several times since then by the Government engineers, all urging its importance and necessity.

I wish that it were possible to change this conference report and replace the measure as it passed this body in March last. That seems now to be out of the question, and to save something for those projects now under improvement I will reluctantly vote with the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors to accept $20,000,000, especially in view of the loss of revenues on account of the war in Europe. I certainly would not do so if there was any other way out of the difficulty.

I hope the improvements now under construction in and around the port of New York will share in the amount carried in the amended bill, and that the Government engineers will see that these are continued during this fiscal year, as they so richly deserve. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconson [Mr. STAFFORD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion there is no question whatever that every Representative from a northern district voting for this extravagant $20,000,000 proposition will retract and apologize before election on November 3 next. There is at the present time, or was on June 30 last, $45,338,000 available for river and harbor improvements, of which $27,872,000 was assigned to certain uncompleted contracts, leaving an unexpended balance available for all river and harbor work on certain designated projects of $18,288,000. That report, from the Secretary of War, is as late as August 3 of this year.

You can not beguile the people in the passage of this added appropriation of $20,000,000 with the idea that it is simply for the maintenance of projects. Scan this report from the Secretary of War and you will see that innumerable projects in every district in the country have available balances for continuing the work, and that in each district there are amounts totaling from $200,000 to $500,000 and more, the average being about $400,000 for each engineering district; and here you are trying to justify the burden that last week you placed upon the people by claiming that one-fifth of the tax levy is for maintenance work of rivers and harbors, when there is at present from last year's river and harbor act and prior bills ample funds for not only maintenance but $18,000,000 for continuing improvement on various projects.

Why, so violent is the protest in the Northern States against the added burden that you cast upon the people last week that the Democrats in their county convention at Madison, Wis., protested against the war-revenue tax as unjustified and unwarranted. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet, in the face of these protests from all quarters, you are going ahead and loading them down still more with this added appropriation of $20,000,000.

Cut down that $20,000,000; save the taxpayers their rightful money. Do not levy taxes upon them until the burden becomes so great that they can not bear it. Why, even the Missouri River—and I call this to the attention of my genial friend from Kansas City [Mr. BORLAND]—had $850,000 available on June 30 for improvement from Kansas City to the mouth of the river. The Galveston district had $600,000 available. The Mississippi River improvement, from the Ohio to the Missouri, had $300,000 available. The Mississippi River to Leach River, Minn., had over $100,000 available. And so on throughout the entire report—on every main project ample funds for continuing the work.

I favor river and harbor bills, but when this bill was under consideration in the House I joined with my colleague [Mr. FREAR] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] in opposing those projects which even the War Department, I believe, will not authorize, among them that unjustified intercoastal canal scheme, which will involve this Government in an expenditure of $100,000,000.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield, because my time is limited. I opposed that scheme because it is chimerical.

I say to the gentlemen of this House that while I favor river and harbor improvements, I do not believe that any business concern would favor bonding or mortgaging their property in order to go ahead with some new project, and that is what the Senate amendment provides. No pressing need exists for this work. In fact, this and the last Congress has been appropriating so much money for this work that the department has not been able to spend it as fast as it is appropriated. The surplus of eighteen millions at the beginning of this fiscal year is proof of your extravagance, and with this large surplus you have the temerity to demand another twenty million. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] strikes out all authorization for the prosecution of work on existing projects and limits the amount to maintenance, which can be justified. But no man can justify in these times—these pressing times—the expenditure of such a large amount as one-fifth of what you intend to levy in your war revenue tax bill for improvements that can without injury to projects or commerce be postponed. I call upon you Democrats who wish to be consistent to show your consistency in favor of economy now. There is $18,000,000 available for river and harbor improvement work at the present time. Five millions will be ample, added to that $18,000,000, to tide over existing conditions, until we can see whether the revenues will warrant further expenditures. Place the country above your partisan influences in favor of local projects. Look at this from the standpoint of what is best for the country as a whole, and do not show that you are in favor of extravagance when the country demands you to be economical in the extreme. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. POU). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] such time as he desires.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the district which I have the honor to represent has nearly a thousand miles of shore line, and probably it has more navigable rivers than any other district in the United States. In the House rivers and harbors bill as finally perfected there were eight projects for that district and two surveys, to say nothing of the interest of my district in certain of the Columbia River projects. All of those items went into this bill strictly on their merits to such an extent that in the hearings it was not necessary to make a statement of more than a few words concerning them. Two projects had to await the arrival of certain papers. The bill was held open for the printed report on the Willapa Harbor report, and no verbal report was necessary. The Grays Harbor maintenance item was forced to await the arrival of the district engineer's estimate and recommendations, and statements that these were here are not true. The Grays Harbor item was added in the Senate on the recommendations of the board, just as I was assured it would be. I was told by the committee that detailed statements were not wanted, and I was asked to write statements for one of the committeemen and the clerk, which I did.

I mention these matters, Mr. Speaker, because out in my district a few disgruntled spirits and disappointed office seekers are still howling over my handling of these items, in spite of the fact that all were settled properly on their merits and were in the bill up to the day the Senate abandoned the whole thing. No one of them could have handled a single item differently.

As a matter of fact, I was most fortunate to have eight worthy and meritorious projects in the bill. Of the eight, three were new projects, namely: Willapa Harbor, Columbia River at Cathlamet, and Skamokawa River. Under the Senate's lump-sum scheme, which the House is now asked to indorse, these three items must wait until another rivers and harbors bill is written. But, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we can not have a perfect bill, and inasmuch as the presentation to the Rivers and Harbors Board of Engineers of $20,000,000 in a lump sum, to be expended as that board sees fit, will cause the board to be damned in the long run, no matter how well it expends that money, I am in favor of the substitute which provides $5,000,000, which is enough to fully provide for the maintenance and upkeep of all the established projects mentioned in the amended rivers and harbors bill. Under that sum five of the eight projects in southwest Washington should be cared for. I quote from pages 41 and 42 of the comparative print of H. R. 13811:

Improving Grays Harbor and bar entrance, Washington: For maintenance, $110,000.

Improving Grays Harbor and Chehalis River, Wash.: For maintenance of improvement of inner portion of Grays Harbor and of Chehalis River up to Montesano, $30,000.

Improving Cowlitz and Lewis Rivers, Wash.: Continuing improvement and for maintenance, including North and East Forks of Lewis River, $16,000.

Improving Grays River, Wash.: For maintenance, $500.

Improving Puget Sound, Wash.: For maintenance of improvement of Puget Sound and its tributary waters, $25,000.

As I said a moment ago, my district loses the new projects—Willapa, Cathlamet, and Skamokawa. Mr. Speaker, in the campaign against me at home I am being roundly criticized by what is called my inactivity and want of knowledge in regard to the southwestern Washington items in the rivers and harbors bill. Inasmuch as eight items and two surveys were placed in the bill on merit, and as five of them are in a position to be cared for under any bill that can be passed, I feel that such criticism is not only unwarranted but extremely unjust. Those who are making such charges are not familiar with the real situation and are taking advantage of the fact that I can not be at home to answer them. These same critics will now charge, without the slightest warrant, that I am sacrificing Willapa, Cathlamet, and Skamokawa. I think, however, that all can see that even with $20,000,000 these three, being new projects, can not be included in the grand grab that is about to begin.

A portion of southwestern Washington lies on the Columbia River, and it will be interesting to citizens there to know that under the $5,000,000 substitute the maintenance of the lower Columbia, the Columbia at Celilo Falls, and repairs and maintenance at the mouth of the Columbia would all be cared for.

As fares the district which I represent, so fare all of the other congressional districts. Then, why, Mr. Speaker, should this House turn loose an extra $15,000,000 to be scrambled for at a time when the majority has just declared that a special direct tax is necessary; at a time when the entire South is clamoring that the Government must help take care of its cotton crop; at a time when the far West is feeling the pinch?

Mr. Speaker, up to this moment during my term in Congress I have not given expression to a single calamity howl, although I have long known that things were going from bad to worse in the Northwest. I had hoped the situation would change. But, Mr. Speaker, in my own district, only last week, five banks closed their doors.

You gentlemen of the South are feeling badly over the cotton situation. You are attending meetings which are being held right here in Washington, D. C., which declare that the Government must buy cotton or give first aid to the banks that will hold warehouse receipts for the cotton. O my friends, the situation is just as bad in the logging industry in the Northwest. Bankers, merchants, millmen, and workingmen know it. I do not care for the political situation; neither do I care what is any man's politics now, when it comes to taking out of the Treasury and placing with the Army Board of Engineers a lump sum of $20,000,000 to spend as it pleases, and which sum the board, I am very sure, from interviews I have had, prefers not to receive.

Mr. Speaker, if owing to circumstances over which we have no control we can not have the perfected bill that was laid down here by a competent committee, that knew what it was doing, we are in poor business to throw out a $20,000,000 lump sum to the Board of Engineers simply because the majority of the Senate will have it that way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER].

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussions of this bill and want to say that I have no doubt many improvements could and should be made in the rivers and harbors of the United States, and I am not opposed to such necessary and reasonable improvements, but unfortunately our Democratic friends have been appropriating money and continued to appropriate money until we find that the entire probable income of the Government is entirely insufficient to cover the extravagant appropriations already made, and as a result only last Friday the Democratic Party passed the so-called war-tax revenue bill in this House, which, if passed by the Senate and signed by the President, will lay added unnecessary and grievous burdens on the people, and for no other reason than to provide money for these reckless appropriations.

The Democratic Party has been preaching economy through its platform, through its press, and from the stump, and yet, when they come into power, the appropriations of a Democratic Congress exceed those of the most extravagant Republican Congress by over $100,000,000.

I repeat what I said last week when the Democratic war-revenue bill was before this House and was passed by a "gag" rule, limiting debate and cutting off all amendments, that if the President had called the heads of the departments together and asked them to at least make some pretense of practicing economy, which the Democratic Party has been preaching for many, many years, instead of calling the two Houses of Congress together and asking them to place extra taxes on the people, it would have been a great deal better and more consistent with Democratic pretenses.

I commend the action of the Senate, which was brought about by the Republican Members of that body, in cutting the appropriations of $53,000,000, which this bill carries with its amendments, to $20,000,000; and if this House will now adopt the amendment offered by the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. HUMPHREY, and cut this $20,000,000 to $5,000,000, which is ample to maintain and preserve existing improvements, it will be at least one honest effort to economize and will be an example which, if it had been followed by the Democrats months ago, would have obviated the need of additional taxes.

In my speech last week I also called attention to the fact that if the Democratic Party had managed the affairs of the Nation on the same economical lines that the Republicans did the balance on hand would have been in excess of $51,000,000 on July 30, 1914, the end of the fiscal year. With this balance on hand and the extra income from the income tax there would have been a sufficient balance that, even if the Democratic Underwood tariff bill fails to produce the revenue, because of the foreign war, there would have been no need of extra taxation. But, unfortunately, these $51,000,000 have been expended, and the balance in the Treasury, which was over $149,000,000 when President Wilson was inaugurated on March 4, 1913 is now less than $115,000,000, showing a decrease of $34,000,000. Notwithstanding these facts, you seem to be determined to keep on appropriating money, regardless of income, and then you pretend to blame the deficit on the European war, when, as a matter of fact, your extra appropriations, which have broken the record, amount to as much as you propose to levy by this war-tax bill which you have just passed; and I want to go on record here and now and say that if you do not stop these reckless appropriations the tax bill you have just passed, even though it will produce $150,000,000 instead of the $105,000,000 you estimate, will be insufficient, and more taxes must be levied before your term of office expires.

When I advocate this cutting out of appropriations, I only advocate that which is practiced by every successful business man and corporation. I need not call your attention to the savings which the railroads of the country have been obliged to make, nor those of other large corporations and the business men and, for that matter, the private citizen; when the revenues are decreased, the sensible thing to do, the proper thing to do, is to cut out unnecessary expenses.

And, furthermore, I am only advocating the course that has always been followed by the Republican Party when they were in control. For instance, when the Spanish War was going on, in 1898, the Republicans passed a war-revenue bill; but did they then turn around and appropriate $20,000,000 for river and harbor improvements? No; they did not pass any river and harbor bill at all in 1898, during the continuance of the war, but in 1899 they passed a very modest river and harbor bill, which carried an appropriation of $16,000,000, with no river and harbor bill at all the year before; and for this modest appropriation what did our Democratic friends say? I will quote from the Democratic platform of 1900:

We denounce the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and which threaten the perpetuation of the present war levies. We favor the reduction and speedy repeal of the war taxes and a return to the time-honored Democratic policy of strict economy in governmental expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, the Republicans passed no river and harbor bill during the Fifty-sixth Congress; the next river and harbor bill after 1899 was passed in 1902. Three years passed by without the passage of a river and harbor bill, and it seems the country was not suffering anywhere because of river and harbor improvements. To repeat, in 1898 we made no appropriation; in 1899 we appropriated $16,000,000; in 1900, nothing; in 1901, nothing; in 1902 we appropriated $26,000,000, and we had made no further appropriations up to the time the Democratic convention met in 1904, and then what does the Democratic platform say?

Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality compatible with vigorous and efficient civil, military, naval administration as a right of the people too clear to be denied or withheld.

Is it any surprise that the people of the country are dumfounded at these extravagant appropriations in the face of these declarations of economy contained in the Democratic platforms? Is it any surprise that the people of the country are beginning to regard the Democratic platform as a joke?

Think of it! A Democratic national convention said that $16,000,000 in two years was gross extravagance; that $26,000,000 in four years was a wanton expenditure, and now, last year, this Democratic Congress appropriated $41,000,000, almost as much as the Republican Congress had appropriated in six years, and this House had passed another bill appropriating, with amendments, $53,000,000, but which has been cut to $20,000,000 by the Senate, but you now insist upon appropriating this $20,000,000 in the face of the fact that there are about $18,000,000 of the appropriation made last year still unexpended, and are refusing to let go of these $20,000,000, which you seem determined to raise by direct taxation. For fear you may have forgotten it, let me again call your attention to the last Democratic national convention, held in Baltimore, when you nominated Woodrow Wilson, and compare your course with your pledge to the people:

We denounce profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil.

We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

Does that sound consistent with your actions here and now, when you are in power? Do you not think that your extra taxation which you have laid upon the people will "drain the substance of the people," and this after you have plunged the country into an industrial depression through the enactment of the Underwood tariff bill, which has destroyed to a large extent the opportunities of the wage earners of the country, who in the last analysis are compelled to pay these taxes?

Laying all politics aside, let us consider what is the situation confronting us. We passed a river and harbor bill during the winter when no one dreamed of a war in Europe and the governmental receipts may have justified the expenditure of the money; but since that time a war in Europe has broken out and this has caused the President to demand extra and new taxation in order to defray the expenses of the Government, and last week a bill in accordance with the ideas of our Democratic friends passed this House by their votes, and their votes only, not a single Republican or Progressive voting for it, and before the ink is hardly dry on the signature of the Clerk of the House, transmitting it to the Senate, you now propose, in face of your repeated promises of economy, in the face of the immense appropriation made last year, in face of the economic record of the Republicans in the past, in face of the fact that no Congress preceding the last Congress has ever appropriated or passed two river and harbor bills in any one Congress, you propose at this time, when we are laying new burdens of taxation upon the people, to appropriate another $20,000,000, which is not needed, and you compel every man who signs a promissory note to contribute to these river and harbor improvements; every man who sends an express or freight package will contribute to these river and harbor improvements; every man who signs a deed will pay 50 cents on each $.00 of value, so that it may be sunk in river and harbor improvements; every man who takes out life insurance will pay 8 cents on each $100 of insurance to contribute to these expenditures; every man who takes out fire insurance will pay 5 mills on each dollar of premium for the same purpose; every wage earner and every farmer who is compelled to borrow money and mortgage his property because of the industrial depression and hard times will contribute 25 cents on each $500 of mortgage above $1,000 for the same purpose. I can not go into the details of this bill, because the whole bill is so obnoxious to me, because it is unnecessary, that I will waste no time to discuss it; but I ask you frankly, you Democrats of the House, is it worth while? Do you want to go to the country upon the proposition that you will appropriate now $20,000,000 for river and harbor improvements, while you are at the same time adding to the taxes of the people? These improvements that have been started can easily be maintained by an appropriation of $5,000,000, and will not be injured if they wait over until such time that the money is available and need not be collected by special taxation. As stated before, $16,000,000 in 1899 carried them along all right for two years, $26,000,000 more in 1902 carried them along all right for four years, and the $41,000,000 appropriated last year certainly should be sufficient to carry them until the next session of Congress. And let me suggest to you here and now that, if you will accept our advice and cut out these needless appropriations which you may as well cut out as not, it is just possible that the Senate may see fit to strike out all of those odious stamp taxes in the war-revenue bill. Let me appeal to you in behalf of the people of this country, and especially in behalf of the people of my district, that you put into practice your professions of economy and abandon your seemingly utter disregard and wasteful, extravagant expenditures of the people's money.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House for nearly 10 years, and during all that time I have observed the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and I never thought that I should live to see this day, bringing, as it does, the spectacle of the father of the "Payne bill" weeping great tears of grief over the extravagance of Congress. It is a sight that I never thought these eyes of mine would behold. [Laughter.] And then the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], another disciple of all the extravagance which has characterized the proceedings of Congress for many years, delivers to us a lecture on economy. Oh, ye gods! [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I rose to refer to some remarks that were made a few days ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. That gentleman saw fit to make an attack upon a couple of rivers in my State. One was the Kissimmee River; and in the course of his remarks he made this statement, which will be found on page 10620 of the RECORD:

> A letter to the engineers is quoted in House Document No. 137, which shows up the $47,000 Kissimmee Creek fraud. This creek, it will be remembered, is shown by the engineer's reports to be dry for periods varying from five to eight months in a single year.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the report referred to, and the gentleman can not point to a single line in this or any other engineer's report which states that the river was dry at all for any period of time. I want to call your attention to what the engineers do say. This is a letter from Gen. Bixby, under date of July 8, 1913, and in the course of that letter he makes this statement:

> Although the amount of commerce handled is small, the special board is of the opinion that this river is worthy of improvement to the extent of maintaining at mean low-water stages a 3-foot channel over the entire 137 miles from Kissimmee to Lake Okeechobee, for which a light-draft dredge and tender will be required at an estimated cost of $35,000 for construction, $12,000 for dredging the first year, and $6,000 for six months' operation annually thereafter.

Then, further down, we find this:

> The board concurs with the special board in believing that it is advisable for the United States to maintain a 3-foot channel in the Kissimmee River from Kissimmee to Lake Okeechobee.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman permit me to point out the report where the statement is found?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I can not yield; I will not. I have the report here. Here is a letter from Mr. Beach, of the Corps of Engineers. He speaks of the low-water surface of Lake Okeechobee, Kissimmee, and Caloosahatchee, and I want to say right here that some statement has been made that this survey of Lake Okeechobee, the Kissimmee and Caloosahatchee Rivers was a scheme to drain certain lands in that vicinity. That statement is absolutely untrue. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the original provision for this survey was put in the river and harbor bill at the instance of the State authorities to determine whether or not after a survey the Federal Government would object to the State lowering the water in Okeechobee in order to carry out their drainage operations, but it was not to cost the United States Government one single, solitary cent. The State was doing the drainage work and this survey was for the sole purpose of determining whether or not the water in that lake could be lowered by the State for drainage purposes without interfering with the navigability of the lake and the rivers, and it was in no sense a scheme to have the Government drain lands in Florida at all. To continue, Mr. Speaker, from this report:

> It appears from the information now available that the section of country covered by this report is rapidly developing, that it is reasonable to believe that there will be a steady increase in the amount of commerce produced in the future, and that as practically all the territory tributary to both the Kissimmee and Caloosahatchee Rivers is dependent upon these streams for transportation any improvement in their navigability will be of material benefit. After long-continued droughts the minimum depth is sometimes reduced to less than 1 foot at shoal places in the upper portion of the river.

There is not one single, solitary line anywhere in it about the river ever having been dry. There is a letter here from Capt. Clay Johnson, captain of a steamer that plies the Kissimmee River, and in that letter he says:

> THE WATERS & CARSON GROCERY CO.,
> Kissimmee City, Fla., March 30, 1909.
> Mr. J. M. BRAXTON,
> United States Engineer Office, Jacksonville, Fla.
> DEAR SIR: The length of time that the boats have been tied up on account of low water on the Kissimmee River and canals since the year 1901 is as follows:

For the year—	Months.
1902	6½
1903	None.
1905	1½
1906	None.
1908	5

> In regard to improving the river I would say, first, to lock the canals between Kissimmee City and Lake Kissimmee, which will throw all the water into one channel and give better water where it is so shoal now; cut off the sharp points so that the boats can make the turns easier, and I think a great deal of good to the run will be accomplished.
> Yours, sincerely, CLAY JOHNSON.
> P. S.—Will have postmaster forward record of rainfall.

It will be observed that Capt. Johnson does not say one word about this river ever being dry. Mr. Speaker, this is a figment, pure and simple, of the gentleman's imagination. There is not one word in the RECORD anywhere to justify it.

With reference now to the Oklawaha River, the gentleman on page 5417 of the RECORD says, paraphrasing Mother Goose:

> We have a crooked creek that has a crooked name, and grabs a crooked million while in a crooked game; to make a crooked water power run up a crooked hill it crooks your Uncle Samuel through a crooked river bill.

Now, this statement, in alleged rhyme, I have no doubt the gentleman believes is the very acme of refined humor, but the trouble is that there is not a scintilla of fact upon which to base it. It is entirely lacking in truth. The gentleman is undoubtedly seeking to pose for the benefit of the "folks back home" as a "watchdog of the Treasury," but, unfortunately for him, his record is against him. Why, Mr. Speaker, this gentleman has presented to this House during this session of Congress two bills to take $75,000 in each case from the Treasury to construct Government buildings in towns in his district, one of them with a little over 2,000 population, and the other with a little over 3,000 population. What is that when you are dealing in crooked games? Is there anything crooked about that? Maybe not. That is economy!

I want now to call attention to Document No. 415, with reference to the Oklawaha River. This document says:

The district officer states that the towns in the vicinity of the lakes have a commerce amounting to about 110,000 tons, none of which is now shipped by water. Ocala has a commerce amounting to about 300,000 tons, of which practically none is now handled by water. The district officer believes that a conservative estimate of the saving that would result from the improvement on a basis of 200,000 tons of commerce would be about $600,000 annually. He believes that the river is worthy of improvement, under certain conditions named, to the extent of providing a 6-foot channel, at an estimated cost of $616,000 and $12,000 annually for maintenence. The division engineer concurs generally in the views of the district officer, and reports the locality as worthy of improvement by the United States.

Yet this is a crooked game, that saves to the people of that community over $600,000 annually in freights upon their produce!

Mr. Speaker, this kind of economy talk makes me sick. There has never been a river and harbor bill more honestly framed, more carefully considered than this one, and I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] that when he was wearing swaddling clothes, politically—and he has hardly got them off yet—my colleague, the distinguished and honored chairman of this committee [Mr. SPARKMAN] was a member of this committee, and he knows more about the rivers and harbors and waterways of this country than the gentleman from Wisconsin would ever know if he lived to be as old as Methuselah. [Applause and laughter.] I want to say again, Mr. Speaker, that no Member of this House who has served here in all of the 20 years that the honored chairman of this committee has been here would have gotten up on this floor and reflected upon him as the gentleman from Wisconsin has seen fit to do, without rhyme or reason, and without facts to support it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. POU). The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for 20 years the able and honored chairman of this committee, Mr. SPARKMAN, has served his State and his country upon the floor of this House. For practically all of that time he has been a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and for the past four years he has been its chairman. There are men here on both sides of this Chamber who for all these 20 years have observed his work as a Representative, and I hazard nothing when I proclaim that no man of loftier purpose, stricter integrity, and manlier conduct ever occupied a seat upon this floor. He is absolutely incapable of engaging in a "crooked game" here or elsewhere, no matter what the stake may be. His name will live in the history of waterway improvement in this country long after the names of the puny critics of this river and harbor bill shall have been effaced from the memory of men.

Mr. Speaker, for many years past the Congress, recognizing the navigability of the Kissimmee and Oklawaha Rivers, has been making appropriations for them.

In 1902, under a Republican administration, a project for the improvement of the Kissimmee River was adopted. The project provided for a channel 3 feet deep at ordinary low-water stages and from 30 to 60 feet wide for about 99.5 miles, from the town of Kissimmee to Fort Bassenger. Ever since that time Republican Congresses have been appropriating the people's money to carry on this project, and not one howl of economy has been raised against it until the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] broke into Congress and discovered that Republican Congresses, Democratic Congresses, Boards of Engineers, and Secretaries of War had all been engaged for all these years in a "crooked game."

In House Document No. 137, Sixty-third Congress, first session, at page 5, Col. Lansing H. Beach, Corps of Engineers, says:

In his report on preliminary examination, under the act of 1909, the district officer reports that 3 small steamboats, drawing about 2 feet, and 50 to 60 launches are in use on the river; that these boats can be operated at ordinary low stages of the water, but that navigation practically ceases during long-continued dry weather. He states that there appears to be about 10,000 tons of freight handled on the Kissimmee River and 30,000 tons in the town of Kissimmee. At a hearing before this board on April 28, 1913, statistics were presented by local parties claiming a present tonnage of about 85,000 tons on the Kissimmee River in addition to 15,000 passengers carried.

From the same document, at page 14, I desire to submit a statement of estimated freights carried on the Kissimmee River for the three years ending December 31, 1905, and December 31, 1906, respectively:

EXHIBIT A.

STATE BANK OF KISSIMMEE,
Kissimmee, Fla., June 25, 1906.

W. H. CALDWELL,
Assistant Engineer.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor requesting estimates of freights transported on Kissimmee River and connections, I beg to submit the following for the year ending December 31, 1905:

	Pounds.
Bricks	32,000
Lumber	500,000
Other building material	200,000
Crossties	120,000
Crate material	400,000
Fertilizers	400,000
Fish	1,500,000
Grain	750,000
Hay	120,000
Hides	50,000
Rosin and turpentine	300,000
Oranges and fruits	400,000
Vegetables	50,000
Groceries	1,000,000
General merchandise	200,000
Logs	12,500,000
Cattle and sheep	1,500,000
	20,022,000

Comparing this with the estimate of previous years will show the progress and impetus given to freights on the river.

Very respectfully,

CLAY JOHNSON.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention a little further to the proposed improvement of the Oklawaha River and as to the necessities for that improvement. In House Document No. 514, Sixty-third Congress, second session, at page 5, in the report of Maj. Lansing H. Beach, the following language is used:

There seems to be a very general demand for this improvement and a firm belief that it would result in a very marked development throughout the adjacent country and create a commerce of considerable magnitude. There is a large section of very rich and fertile country tributary to this waterway and to the lakes at its head, which is being converted into orange groves and truck farms. It is stated that under present conditions business is hampered by high transportation charges and by congestion in rail freights during the busy season, and that relief can be obtained only by a competitive waterway.

Again, in the same document, on page 8, I read from the report of Capt. J. R. Slattery, Corps of Engineers, a portion of a former report made by Capt. Sackett, and which is quoted by Capt. Slattery, as follows:

I am informed that during the time the Oklawaha steamers ran to Leesburg the rate on a box of oranges from Leesburg to Jacksonville was 10 cents. Shipments from the large orange groves at Emeralda, situated on the river and on Lake Griffin where the river leaves the lake, are now required to be made across the lake on a boat owned by the railroad and delivered at the terminal owned by the railroad at Leesburg. The rate from Emeralda to Leesburg is 9 cents per box and the rate from Leesburg to Jacksonville is 17 cents, a total of 26 cents, as against the rate of 10 cents formerly enjoyed. There is said to be 100,000 boxes of oranges and vegetables shipped from Emeralda annually. This represents a very considerable burden upon the shippers of this locality. It is said to frequently happen that during the rush of the shipping season the railroads can not or do not supply sufficient cars to care for the shipments offered, and much delay and often considerable loss is occasioned thereby.

Again, on page 19, Capt. Slattery, after giving a statement of the commercial statistics of the towns and localities tributary to the Oklawaha, sums the whole matter up by using this language:

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that there are approximately 500,000 to 600,000 tons of freight, the transportation charges on which will be affected more or less by the improvement on the Oklawaha River.

On the same page of the report, Capt. Slattery again says:

If as a result of the improvement of the river there should be a general reduction of 15 cents per hundredweight in rail rates, approximately the existing difference between the Sanford and the Leesburg and Ocala rates on sixth-class goods, the total saving in freight would amount to $1,800,000. I do not believe that any such saving as this is probable, but I believe it would be conservative to estimate that a saving of 15 cents per hundredweight would result on 200,000 tons, making a total annual saving of $600,000, if a 6-foot channel were provided.

I want to say just here that Capt. Slattery is one of the ablest officers and ablest engineers attached to our military establishment, and after he had made a full and complete investigation and personal inspection of the Oklawaha River and the country tributary thereto, and had thoroughly examined into the present and reasonably prospective commerce, he sums the whole matter up, on page 20 of the report, by using the following language:

In view of the material saving that would probably be effected in freight charges if the river were improved, the promising character of much of the territory that borders the lakes and the swamp through which the river flows, and the fact that an improved waterway along this line would be a step toward a trans-Florida canal along the best route as recommended by a special board of engineer officers, I am of the opinion that the Oklawaha River is worthy of improvement to the extent of providing a 6-foot channel from its mouth to Mount Dora. * * *

Notwithstanding the fact, however, that this matter has been so thoroughly investigated and the project approved by the district officer, the division officer, and the Board of Engineers and the Chief of Engineers, and was then approved by the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, it remained for the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] to belittle it and to put his judgment in the scale as against the judgment of all these gentlemen. We have the testimony of every engineer, and in fact of every individual who has examined the project who knows anything at all about the subject, that it is worthy of improvement by the Government of the United States and ought to be undertaken. With these facts and with this record, I am willing to submit the case to the judgment of my colleagues upon this floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, responding immediately to the last statement of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], in reference to the garb of the gentleman from Wisconsin, who he said was wearing only "his political swaddling clothes," I presume the friends of the gentleman from Wisconsin will congratulate him upon wearing those early garments rather than wearing what a great many gentlemen who are trying to get through this big river and harbor bill will be wearing pretty soon, namely, their political shrouds. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, in considering the situation that is here I do not see any reason for intense partisanship. I am in favor of reasonable improvements, whether they are in the interior of this great country of ours or along the coasts or along the banks of the great rivers. But this seems to be the proposition before the American people now: How much of this money shall be used, and what are we trying to use it for? It was enormous as it passed the House. It was $53,000,000 to begin with in the Senate. It was reduced by a determined minority to $20,000,000. The purpose of the bill seems to be to purchase water to fill some rivers and some harbors and to let it run through some creeks which perhaps were never moist except in the case of a heavy dew. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But the next proposition in the disposition of the people's money, after we buy water to fill the rivers and harbors, is to buy ships to float on this purchased water in these moistened harbors and rivers. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And how do we expect to get the money to buy this water in which to float these ships on these rivers and harbors? We have just solved that in the last few days. We passed a war-revenue tax bill in time of peace to grind the faces of the poor and press down upon and overload the industries of this country. These being the main propositions before the American people, it seems we ought to make the burden just as light as possible. Therefore I am in favor of reducing the sum to be here appropriated to the smallest amount possible, for two reasons: First, the $20,000,000 proposition is to be taken from under the jurisdiction and the authority of Members of this House and its coordinate body, and is to be given to the administration of an executive branch of this Government to be disposed of by it and beyond the control of the membership of this body. We ought to have the right and power to determine when or in what part of the United States this money should be spent. But if we are to abdicate our authority and jurisdiction over the funds of the people of the United States, we ought to abdicate for as small an amount as possible.

The second reason why this amount should be small is this: We should set the pace for economy for the other body, or, perhaps, we should respond to the example that has been so well set by the other body in this bill. The war-revenue measure provides for the taxing of the American people to raise about a quarter of a billion of dollars during its probable lifetime. Taking into account when the bill will probably become a law and the period within which it all will be in force, there will be a quarter of a billion collected from the people. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said the Senate slept with this bill for six months and reduced it to $20,000,000. Let us send it back for another nap, and let it be cut to $5,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. How many more speeches will the gentleman have?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will only have two—one very short.

Mr. SPARKMAN. All right, then, proceed until you have used up one more speech, and then I will proceed.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this morning I attempted to give my reasons why I was opposed to the Senate amendment. I have no criticism of the bill as reported to the House. I think it was made up honestly. I do not think there was any politics or partisanship in it. Of course, there may have been some mistakes. In addition to what I said this morning, in view of the changed conditions which have come about, and in view of the fact it will only be a few months before we make up another bill, and in view of the fact that on a great many projects no money can be expended until after the 4th of next March, I think we ought to listen to the demand that has come from the people that we economize. The condition throughout the country is most deplorable. Even the majority now admit this. We may not agree what has caused this condition, but we know that it exists. You gentlemen upon that side of the aisle say it is due to the war. Upon this side of the aisle we say that the condition existed before the war. I call the attention of the House and the country to this fact as having some bearing upon the condition in the country to-day, that every day that the present Democratic tariff law has been upon the statute books we have lost more than $1,000,000 in our foreign trade, and every day of this session of Congress a Democratic majority, pledged to economy, has already spent $363,000 more than the most extravagant Republican Congress that ever met in this Capitol.

I think you can find explanation for the condition of the country here in these enormous expenditures, surpassing any that have ever been made, and by the tremendous falling off in our trade. The falling off in our foreign trade alone amounts to $1,000,000 each day in wages taken from the Americans and given to the foreigner.

Mr. COOPER. And had been before the war?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The condition I am speaking of was before the war. In other words, our foreign trade decreased $248,000,000 this year up to August 1. This is the calendar year. And the people everywhere are economizing. The people of this country to-day are not spending as much for clothes as they did a year ago. They are not eating as much as they did a year ago. They are denying themselves amusements and pleasures. Every man that is in business is being compelled to economize. We have heard economy talked on that side of the aisle, and I trust that every man on this side will vote for real economy. There is no great necessity why we should have a sum greater than $5,000,000 to take care of our river and harbor projects until we can pass another bill. [Applause.] It has been suggested that if the appropriation is cut to $5,000,000 that many of the projects in the State of Washington will suffer. Even if that is true I would be unworthy of a place upon this floor if I thought only of my own State. I know that I represent a constituency that do not want what they are not willing to grant to their neighbor. At this time, when they are being forced to economize in everything, the people of my State do not want to be further taxed to care for the river and harbor projects of others that can without great injury be passed for a time, and they do not want the rest of the country taxed to pay for theirs in the same condition. Except in a few localities, owing to climatic conditions and to the fact that the force on many projects have already scattered because of the long delay in passing this bill, but little work can be done until next spring. The war in Europe may have ended by then. In a few weeks another bill can be made up in view of the conditions as they then exist. In my own State, whether we pass a bill for $20,000,000 or $5,000,000 will make little difference. We will get little, if any, of the $20,000,000, except for maintenance, and we will get that if only $5,000,000 is appropriated. Under either proposition the much-needed improvement at Willapa Harbor will not be cared for. Under either no surveys will be authorized. This omission will result in great injury to the Lake Washington Canal. Here we have strikingly illustrated the iniquity of the Senate amendment where a great project costing more than $5,000,000 is indefinitely delayed by a refusal to grant a survey that probably would not cost the Government $50. In fact it is merely a formality, but this can not be done. Looking at it from a purely selfish standpoint, it makes practically no difference to western Washington whether the bill carries $5,000,000 or $20,000,000 if it is given in a lump sum. We will get practically the same amount in either event. But for the good of the river and harbor improvements in this country in the future I think it would be infinitely better for us to appropriate only a sufficient sum to maintain present projects until the next session of Congress.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, how much time did I use?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking out, in lines 24 and 25, on page 66, the words "the mouth of the Ohio River" and insert in lieu thereof "Rock Island, Ill."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is made for the purpose of correcting what I believe to have been an error made by the Senate. It does not increase the amount of the appropriation as agreed upon in the Senate. The effect of the amendment is to provide that any moneys expended on the Mississippi River, under the direction of the Mississippi River Commission, for the purpose of revetting banks and assistance in levee building, shall be expended not on the lower Mississippi River alone, but also on the upper river as far north as Rock Island, Ill.

This is not a new project. In the bill of 1913 an appropriation of $200,000 was made for the upper river for the purpose of making surveys, the balance left after paying the expense of the surveys to be allotted among the several levee districts on the upper river; and this was done. The surveys were made, and they cost $10,000, leaving $190,000 of this amount which the Mississippi River Commission have actually allotted to levee districts on the upper Mississippi River. The original act establishing the Mississippi River Commission in 1878 gave it jurisdiction all the way from the Head of the Passes to the headwaters of the river. Appropriations heretofore have been made, however, for the purpose of levee building, to be expended under the control of the Mississippi River Commission, and have until 1913 been limited to points below the mouth of the Ohio River.

Now, I expect to vote for this bill whether this amendment is adopted or not. I always vote for river and harbor bills, and I regret exceedingly the emasculation of this bill in the Senate. The effect of the Senate amendment is to declare martial law for the rivers of the United States, and leave it to the discretion of Army engineers as to how $20,000,000 is to be expended. The place to economize is not in the rivers of the country, the great freight regulators reaching out through all the States; the place to economize is somewhere else.

Now, I hope this amendment will prevail. It will not make any difference whatever in the amount of this appropriation if it does prevail. It simply is an act of justice for the levee districts on the upper river, and there are nearly 50 of them maintained now by the owners of the land back of them, not assisted by the Government in any way, although the Government heretofore has on two or three occasions assisted in levee building on the upper river. Back of these levees—and there are 216 miles of levees along this stretch from Cape Girardeau north to Rock Island, Ill.—in the State of Illinois alone, there are nearly 800,000 acres of the best land in the world, that can all be reclaimed. On these rich alluvial bottoms along the upper river it is possible to raise every year, if the river is kept out of the levee districts, 60,000,000 bushels of corn, worth at the present prices of corn in this country over $40,000,000. Money expended on levees on the upper river is not wasted, because the river does not wander around through a wide valley, but maintains its channel, and we have the kind of material up there for the building of levees which hold against overflows, and when a levee is once built, if it is built high enough and wide enough at the base, it will hold back almost any flood in the upper Mississippi River.

The land back of these levees on the upper river will produce other crops than corn. It will produce wheat, rye, oats, potatoes, clover, alfalfa; in fact, anything that will grow in the North Temperate Zone can be produced on this land—the richest land in all the world, more fertile than the land in the valley of the Nile. The principal crop, of course, is corn. They grow corn in all the nations of the world. Every European nation produces corn; but these lands on the upper river we are trying to reclaim will produce every year one-third as much corn as can be produced in all of Europe. The land back of these levees will produce more corn every year than we can ever expect the Argentine Republic to send us in one year, even if we have in this country another shortage equal to that of last year.

We consider corn to be just as valuable a crop as cotton, adding just as much to the national wealth. If the cotton plantations of the South are to be protected against the ravages of this great river, the same reasons for protection apply also to the cornfields of the North.

There is no conceivable reason why Government aid for levees should stop at Cape Girardeau, Mo. In 1878, when the present policy was adopted, it was contemplated in the act that the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission should extend as far north as the headwaters of the Mississippi River. My amendment to this bill simply restores to this commission a part of the jurisdiction of which it has been deprived and permits the commission to assist in levee building as far north as Rock Island, Ill., out of the fund provided for levee building on the Mississippi River.

The bill of 1913 appropriated $200,000 for levees on the upper river; $190,000 of this amount remains. This is not a new project—Government aid for levees on the upper river. The surveys have been made; the commission has reached its conclusions as to what districts ought to be helped. They have in their hands now $190,000 to assist in the work on the upper levees.

The Senate substitute, which we are now considering, through an error, I believe, deprives the commission of the jurisdiction of the upper river that it was given in the act of 1913. In the Senate there was no objection to expending a portion of the fund allowed for levee building on the upper river. This was not a subject of criticism in the Senate. The most violent stretch of imagination can not say that this part of the bill is improper or can be considered a "pork-barrel" measure, and no one in the Senate made a charge of that character. This is simply an oversight which ought to be corrected, in justice to thousands of farmers in the North engaged in producing cereals for the Nation.

Even if my amendment is adopted, every dollar provided for in the Senate substitute which may be allotted to levee building can still be expended on the lower river if the commission thinks the flood situation demands that it be expended there; and even if any part of it is spent on the upper river, we expect by far the greater portion of the amount allotted for levees to be expended on the lower river.

I have every reason to believe that this merely formal amendment which I propose will be accepted without difficulty by the Senate and will not imperil the passage of this bill. If I thought it would, I would not insist upon it at this time.

I sincerely hope the amendment will be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BALTZ. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAINEY. My time has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Loud applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. But before I discuss that I want to state emphatically that there is no ground whatever for claiming that this was a sectional bill originally. That is settled by reading the list of the gentlemen who compose this Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There are 9 southern men on that committee, counting Missouri and West Virginia as Southern States, and 12 northern men. The list of the committee is: Mr. SPARKMAN of Florida, Mr. BURGESS of Texas, Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi, Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama, Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia, Mr. SMALL of North Carolina, Mr. BOOHER of Missouri, Mr. GALLAGHER of Illinois, Mr. DRISCOLL of New York, Mr. DONOHOE of Pennsylvania, Mr. SCULLY of New Jersey, Mr. MURRAY of Massachusetts, Mr. LIEB of Indiana, Mr. KETTNER of California, Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, Mr. BARCHFELD of Pennsylvania, Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia, Mr. SWITZER of Ohio, Mr. POWERS of Kentucky, and Mr. TREADWAY of Massachusetts; and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania are the only two States in the Union that have two members each on that committee.

I would be perfectly willing to adopt the speeches of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] as my speech. This amendment, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], does not increase the amount to be spent one cent. It simply undertakes to do for the Mississippi River north of the mouth of the Ohio River partially what it does for the river south of the mouth of the Ohio River.

The northern portion of the Mississippi River runs through the richest country under heaven—richer than the valley of the Ganges or the Delta of the Nile. It is in the heart of the continent. It has on its banks great cities and manufacturing plants, to say nothing of the vast agricultural products. St. Louis is the metropolis of the Mississippi Valley and it is on the upper Mississippi River.

At Louisiana, in the county that I live in, is the largest nursery on the face of the earth. About 4 miles above that, in the same county, on the banks of the Mississippi, is the largest dynamite mill in the world. About 20 miles above that—still in my district, but not in my county, in Ralls County—is what is called the Hannibal cement plant, although Hannibal itself is in Mr. LLOYD'S district. That is the largest cement plant in the wide, wide world. In addition to that you have the cities of Louisiana, Hannibal, Quincy (Ill.), Keokuk, Burlington, Muscatine, and finally at the north end of this part of the Mississippi that we propose to improve are the tri-cities, Davenport, Iowa, Rock Island and Moline, Ill., and there is a United States armory that ought to be made the largest in the United States.

It is just as important to improve the upper portion of the Mississippi River—perhaps not as important, because there is more water, and therefore there will be more commerce from the mouth of the Ohio down—but nevertheless and notwithstanding, it is a wise and economic principle in the long run to improve the upper Mississippi River and to improve the Missouri River, as the gentleman from Kansas City [Mr. BORLAND] stated.

I am not in favor of squandering or wasting money; but if it was wise—and I believe it was, and I helped along with it—to irrigate the dry lands of the West in order to settle up that country, why is it not just as wise to keep the waters of the United States off of the lands along the Mississippi and the Missouri, to create homes for our children and our children's children? [Applause.] Of course, any drainage project should be so safeguarded that ultimately it will pay back to the Government every dollar advanced, just as it is expected and intended that the irrigation projects shall do.

There is enough overflowed land on the Mississippi and its tributaries—the richest land, acre for acre, under the shining sun—to make a State as big as the State of Missouri, that ultimately would support 25,000,000 people, right in the heart of civilization, where we have churches and railroads and schools and telephones and telegraphs and all the appliances of the highest civilization the world has ever known; but the very minute that anybody wants to do anything for the overflowed lands out in that country the yell goes up that it is a "pork" proposition. It is a monstrous canard, and that is all there is to it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. MANN. Not yet.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been listening all day to this debate, and have been trying to square my vote with the amendments that have been offered. My colleague, the ranking Member on the Republican side of this committee [Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington] has rendered faithful service in the matter of getting appropriations for harbors and for public buildings in the district that he has represented, and I feel a hesitancy when it comes to voting against an amendment that he proposes, on the ground that it does not get money for my State; but each and every one of the propositions submitted for the State of Washington and included in the report of the committee is a very meritorious proposition. Each project is a worthy one. I represent in part the entire State, as a Member at large on this floor, so that I feel an interest in each one of these projects, including the projects down at Willapa Harbor and at Grays Harbor, where my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of Washington] is the Representative. But if we vote for $5,000,000 instead of $20,000,000, we shall, it seems to me, vote against the best interests of those projects. If they are meritorious propositions, as I know they are, they will very likely get in on the $20,000,000; but if they do not get in on the $20,000,000, they will surely have a better chance later on, if the $20,000,000 is appropriated, than if the $5,000,000 is appropriated. I can not, for the life of me, believe that I should be voting for the interests of my State if I voted for the $5,000,000 amendment, as my colleagues, Mr. HUMPHREY and Mr. JOHNSON, have advised in their speeches on this floor. I can not believe that I should be voting for the interest of Willapa Harbor and Grays Harbor, that are represented by my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of Washington]. I feel that when I vote for those improvements I am not only voting for the interest of my State, but I am voting for the interest of the country at large, and that a vote for them is a meritorious vote. That is why I am unable to accord any kind of approval to the proposition to eliminate $15,000,000 from this bill. We need all that we can get. I do not believe we ought to economize in that way. I believe that $20,000,000 is not too much to be appropriated. The original report of the committee, appropriating about $40,000,000, was concurred in by the gentlemen of the minority generally. This bill directly benefits my people in the State of Washington as to those particular improvements, and I say it seems to me that I would not only be violating the interest of Willapa Harbor and Grays Harbor and the harbors in the district of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] and those in the district of my other colleague, but that I would also be violating the interests of the country at large if I were to vote for $5,000,000 instead of $20,000,000. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss the political phases of this bill as it now presents itself to the House. I think it is futile to discuss whether the reduction in this river and harbor bill has been brought about by reason of the war in Europe or by reason of the filibuster of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. The practical proposition that we must confront now and pass upon to-day is whether we shall adopt this $20,000,000 proposition or defeat it and run the risk of getting more or none at all. I am frank to confess my regret that it has been necessary to bring into the House a bill appropriating the lump sum of $20,000,000 to be expended by any department of the Government. There are many meritorious propositions and projects in the United States which ought not to be delayed or deferred. I indorse absolutely and in toto every word that the Speaker of the House uttered a moment ago with reference to the Mississippi River. The Mississippi and the Ohio are the two great rivers in the United States that may be considered national propositions. Several years ago, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], a project was inaugurated to canalize the Ohio River from the head of navigation to its mouth on the Mississippi.

If the investment of Government money in the Ohio River will not prove a successful and paying investment from the standpoint of commerce, then it is absolutely useless to spend money on any other river in the United States, for on either side of that great stream, both north and south, there are not only rich acres of fertile land but numerous cities dotting either bank from the mouth to the head of navigation. Not only that, but there are tributaries to this great river like the Cumberland, which above Nashville carried more than 9,000,000 tons of freight last year and below Nashville practically the same amount, which runs into the coal regions which has as much coal as there is in Alaska, where we propose to spend $40,000,000 to take out coal and ice and other materials indigenous to that country. If the canalization of the rivers of the central Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, Tennessee, and the Cumberland will not be a paying investment, I think the sooner we disband and abolish all river improvements the better it will be for the country at large.

I regret—whether it be chargeable to a filibuster in another body of Congress or on account of the European war—that we are compelled as a matter of necessity to take $20,000,000 in a lump sum or run the risk of getting no improvements whatever. I have confidence in the Board of Engineers and believe that they will allot the money where it will be most necessary. I hope that they will allot it to such places and will not undertake to satisfy every Member of Congress. I am willing to give up a portion of that which will come to my district if it will help the others. I am willing, if it is necessary, to sacrifice a part of the appropriation for the rivers that affect my district, which has more miles of navigable streams than any other district in the United States, composed, as it is, of the Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee, and Cumberland, but I do believe that the Board of Engineers, with patriotism and expert knowledge, will allot the money to the Mississippi River Commission, which will have charge of that allotted to the Mississippi, and will parcel out the money where it will be most economically spent not only for navigation and commerce but for the saving of the lives of the people and the destruction of property.

I have not time to recount the great destruction of property from the mouth of the Ohio River to New Orleans, a region where the Government of the United States is undertaking to prevent destruction and loss of life.

As I say, in the absence of any better proposition, in the absence of the hope of getting more, under protest, I am willing to vote for the $20,000,000 proposition which the Senate has sent over to us.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. POU). The gentleman has 14 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE].

[Mr. DONOHOE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LIEB].

[Mr. LIEB addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

[Mr. FOSTER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

[Mr. STANLEY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this amendment, not because I favor it but because I am unwilling that the projects therein provided for and already commenced shall be temporarily abandoned and thousands of men now engaged in work on these improvements thrown out of employment. I am opposed, however, to the appropriation of a "lump sum" to be expended under the direction of the Board of Engineers, as provided for in this amendment. The money appropriated for these improvements ought to be allotted in accordance with the merits of all the various projects recommended by the engineers, and should not be confined simply to old projects, some of which may be of far less importance than the new ones. I am also opposed to it because I know that whatever allotments may be made by the Board of Engineers will probably subject the members thereof to the criticism, whether just or unjust, of yielding to the importunities of the more influential Members of this body. This might tend to lessen our confidence in this board.

But, Mr. Speaker, I arose to say only a few words in support of the project for the improvement of the Norfolk-Portsmouth and Newport News Channels. This is a new project and will be defeated by the adoption of this amendment. I very much regret this, because I know that the commerce of these ports is amply sufficient to justify the appropriations recommended by the Board of Engineers. The amount recommended for this project by the Board of Engineers was only $1,114,000, and the bill as it passed the House carried an initial appropriation of $400,000 therefor.

I have heard much said to-day about the commerce of the great ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. I am convinced that the commerce of these great ports is amply sufficient to justify us in making appropriations for their improvement. I believe that they should be improved in the interest of commerce. I have been somewhat surprised, however, that none of the speakers have included the port of Norfolk-Portsmouth among the great ports of the Atlantic seaboard. And yet, Mr. Speaker, the tonnage of the port of Norfolk-Portsmouth certainly ranks fourth, if not third, among the ports of the Atlantic coast, and the combined water tonnage of Norfolk-Portsmouth and Newport News is probably greater than that of any other port on the Atlantic coast, with the single exception of New York. The water commerce of the port of Norfolk-Portsmouth, which amounted to less than 2,000,000 tons in 1888, 5,000,000 tons in 1900, and 12,000,000 tons in 1910, for the fiscal year 1912 exceeded a total of 22,000,000 tons and a value of more than one and one-half billion dollars. The increased tonnage for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, was over 3,000,000 short tons. The same increase for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, would make the present tonnage of this port exceed 25,000,000 tons. It is doubtful if any port on the entire Atlantic coast can show a more steadily increasing tonnage, and if this increase continues, and it is confidently believed it will, the day is not far distant when its water tonnage will exceed that of some of its present rivals. It is already greater than any of the South Atlantic or Gulf ports, and when combined with the tonnage of Newport News, also provided for in the defeated project, it is doubtful if any port on the Atlantic coast, with the single exception of New York, can show a greater tonnage.

In addition to its commerce the Norfolk-Portsmouth Channel is traversed by naval vessels, including the largest colliers and battleships, going to and from the Norfolk Navy Yard. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, 6,666 vessels, of which 2,298 were American, 3,125 foreign steamers, and 33 foreign sailing vessels, cleared the port of Norfolk-Portsmouth. This does not include the large number of coastwise steamers and vessels having Norfolk as the southern terminus of their lines, and does not include the many local tugs and sailing vessels entering this port. The Norfolk-Portsmouth Channel is a very busy one. As many as four and five vessels are frequently seen abreast in the channel. The width of the channel is not sufficient for the actual demands of its business, and a greater width is demanded for its growing commerce.

The total appropriations made for the improvement of the Norfolk-Portsmouth Harbor from 1876 to 1914 aggregate only $2,265,458.84, a small amount in comparison with the amounts expended for the improvement of the other great ports on the Atlantic seaboard. The steady growth of its commerce amply justifies the expenditure of this amount in the improvement of this harbor. I had hoped that the additional appropriation carried in the House bill for its further improvement would not be defeated. It is an improvement that ought not longer be neglected, and which the business of this harbor properly requires.

The bad projects, if any, in the House bill ought to have been eliminated, but projects of this character ought to have been provided for.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I never expect to agree with everybody else and seldom with anybody else. Hence I have no criticism to make of people who do not agree with me. I think it is a mistake in the House where some gentleman makes a fight, believing that he is right, that other Members of the House should therefore indulge in personal criticism, if not abuse. [Applause on the Republican side.] Hence I think some of the remarks which have been made to-day violently criticizing the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] were unjustifiable, although in many respects about the river and harbor bill I do not agree with him.

I was much surprised that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], for whom I have always entertained a high regard, descended so far in debate, as it seems to me he did, endeavoring to give a roast to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], who I think is entitled to the thanks of the country for what he has done, whether he be right or wrong. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], addressing the House with considerable fervor, said:

You call this a "pork-barrel" bill. It is no more a "pork-barrel" bill than the pension bills. I have always voted for pension bills, coming from the South as I do.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. What for?

Mr. HARRISON. I know the gentleman does not want to misrepresent me, but I did not say that I always voted for pension bills; I said I believed in a reasonable pension for those who deserved it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said in effect that he always voted for the pension bills. If he does not make any change in his remarks, the RECORD will justify what I say. It excited my attention and recalled to my memory the fact that the gentleman was slightly in error, in my judgment, and I sent for the RECORD. We have had several roll calls on pension bills, both on private pension bills and on the general appropriation bills, during the last Congress. The gentleman said in effect, "Look at me; I favor pension bills to be paid to the northern soldiers, but you are now opposing a river and harbor bill to be expended in the South," and he criticized the gentlemen who were opposing the Senate amendment in this respect. And I find that on March 21, 1912, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] moved to suspend the rules and pass a private omnibus pension bill, which was passed by a vote of 193 yeas to 34 nays, the name of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], while it did not lead all the rest, is to be found conspicuously among those voting nay; and on February 18, 1913, when the vote was taken again on the passage of an omnibus private pension bill, and the yeas and nays were ordered at the demand of Mr. Roddenbery, when the yeas were 219 and the nays were 40, that again the name of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who favors pension legislation and pension bills, is found recorded among those voting nay. And on March 9, 1912, when we had before us the annual appropriation bill making appropriations to pay those pensions which had already been allowed under the law, on a point of no quorum being made, and the yeas and nays being ordered, the yeas on the passage of the bill being 214 and the nays 38, I find that again the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, so ardently in favor of pension bills and pension appropriation bills, had his name recorded as voting nay.

Mr. Speaker, I should not have referred to this except for the holier-than-thou attitude which the gentleman from Mississippi assumed while criticizing the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. It is a pretty good thing when you live in a glass house not to throw stones. So much for that.

Mr. Speaker, the Spanish War was going on in 1898. I entered the House during that Congress. The first regular session was being held when the Spanish War was declared. That war was going on when Congress adjourned. Did the Republicans pass a river and harbor appropriation bill at that session of Congress? We passed a war-revenue bill, increasing the tax laid upon the people. Did we turn around then and appropriate money for river and harbor improvements which might easily wait over? We did not. We passed no river and harbor bill in 1898, during the continuance of the war, and immediately following the law providing for an increase in taxation. The next year, in 1899, what did we do? We passed a river and harbor bill which carried only $16,000,000. Sixteen million dollars, and no river and harbor bill the year before. We passed a modest river and harbor bill, and shortly after that the Democratic national convention adopted a platform, bearing in mind even the appropriation of $16,000,000 in two years for rivers and harbors, in which they made use of this language, and I read now from the Democratic platform of 1900:

We denounce the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and which threaten the perpetuation of the oppressive war levies.

We favor the reduction and speedy repeal of the war taxes, and a return to the time-honored Democratic policy of strict economy in governmental expenditures.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Speaker, we passed no river and harbor bill during the Fifty-sixth Congress. The next river and harbor bill after 1899 was passed in 1902, at the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. We did not pass a river and harbor bill at the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress. Three years passed by without the passage of a river and harbor bill, and, so far as I know, the country was not suffering anywhere because we were waiting on river and harbor improvements.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield me the time. I will yield if he will take it out of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois declines.

Mr. MANN. I decline to yield out of my time, but not out of his.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Then I will say what I have to say in my own time.

Mr. MANN. That is better. We appropriated $16,000,000 in 1899, nothing in 1898, nothing in 1900, nothing in 1901, and in 1902 we appropriated $26,000,000, and we had made no further appropriation up to the time that the Democratic convention met in 1904. That convention, foreseeing the future, foreseeing that in the Sixty-third Congress the Democratic Party would appropriate $41,000,000 last year and try to appropriate $53,000,000 this year—and even if it appropriates $20,000,000 this year it will appropriate $63,000,000 in two years, where the Republicans have appropriated $26,000,000 in four years—in one of its planks adopted this language:

Large reductions can easily be made in the annual expenditures of the Government without impairing the efficiency of any branch of the public service, and we shall insist upon the strictest economy and frugality compatible with vigorous and efficient civil, military, and naval administration as a right of the people too clear to be denied or withheld.

Think of it! A Democratic national convention said that $16,000,000 in two years was gross extravagance; that $26,000,000 in four years was a wanton expenditure, and the country has not changed very much since then, as far as any river and harbor improvements are concerned. And now last year this Congress having appropriated $41,000,000, as much as a Republican Congress had appropriated in six years, you insist upon appropriating another $20,000,000 in the face of the platform of the last Democratic national convention. I know you want to forget it, but I am going to read it to you. I do not blame you for wishing you could tear it out of the platform:

We denounce the profligate waste of the money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and reduced the purchasing power of the people's toil. We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

I am glad to note that a few gentlemen on the Democratic side can still applaud that utterance in that platform without blushing. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Most of them can not do it. [Applause on the Republican side.] What is the situation confronting us? We passed a river and harbor bill during the winter, when no one dreamed of a war in Europe. The governmental receipts may have justified the expenditure of the money, but since that time a war in Europe has broken out which has caused this administration to demand a new taxation. The ink is hardly dry on the signature of the Clerk of this House transmitting to the Senate a bill to increase the taxes of the people and now, in the face of the record of the past, in the face of the fact that no Congress preceding the last Congress has ever appropriated or passed two rivers and harbors bills in any one Congress, you propose to reverse all the policy of the Government in the past, at this time when we are laying new burdens of taxation upon the people, and appropriate the money, which is not needed for present maintenance of projects. Every man who signs a promissory note will contribute to these river and harbor improvements which might wait over without damage; every man who sends an express or freight package will contribute to these river and harbor expenditures; every man who sends a telephone or telegraph message will contribute to these river and harbor expenditures; every man who signs a deed will pay 50 cents on each $500 of value that it may be sunk in river and harbor improvements; every man who takes out life insurance will pay 8 cents on each $100 of insurance to contribute to these rivers and harbors expenditures; every man who takes out fire insurance will pay 5 mills on each $1 of premium to the same end; every man who is hard up and mortgages his property will contribute 25 cents on each $500 of mortgage above $1,000 to this end. Is it worth the while? Do you think on the Democratic side of the House that you want to go to the country upon the proposition that you propose to appropriate now $20,000,000 for river and harbor improvements while you are in the meanwhile adding to the taxes of the people? These improvements will not be injured if they wait over. Sixteen million dollars in 1899 carried them along well; $26,000,000 more in 1902 carried them along well; $41,000,000 last year was sufficient to carry the river and harbor improvements certainly until the next session of Congress. Economy! My friend from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] referred to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]—and I am not sure but he did to myself—as being in favor of extravagant expenditures. While I do not criticize my friend from Florida, who is so seldom here on the floor that he does not know what position we do take, but whatever position we have taken, we take the position now that these river and harbor improvements and maintenance can well wait over until we know what effect will be caused by the European war upon our revenues. [Applause on the Republican side.] It will not hurt anybody except those who seek to be returned to Congress only upon the basis that they have secured appropriations, and I hope there are none of that kind.

I do not think it wise to do this. If this river and harbor bill is defeated, or the amount appropriated is reduced from $20,000,000 to $5,000,000, the Senate may well strike out all of these odious stamp taxes in the war-revenue bill, and if we will keep the expenditure for rivers and harbors down to where they belong at this time that action, in my opinion, will be taken in the Senate. And then when we have the money raised in the ordinary way we will continue the river and harbor improvements throughout the country where they ought to be continued, by proper legislative action, instead of leaving it as a matter of favoritism to the engineers of the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield that to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], if he so desires.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement of my position on this bill. The motion to concur in the Senate amendment will eliminate all new projects which were proposed in the bill by the House. When the bill passed the House it contained an item of $500,000 for the removal of what is known as Coenties Reef, in the East River. The city of New York is engaged in the construction of a subway system to relieve the congested transportation situation in that city that involves an expenditure of $300,000,000. One of the tubes to connect the island of Manhattan with Brooklyn is projected to pass through that reef. The officials of the city of New York, joining with the Army engineers, presented to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors the item for the appropriation and authorization for the removal of the reef at this time, because if it be not done at the earliest opportunity it will have to be undertaken after tubes providing for double-track trains have been built under the river through the reef. The cost will be greatly increased, while the danger of doing the work and the possibility of completely damaging, if not ruining, the subway system is recognized by all engineers as very great. I can not bring myself to vote for an appropriation of $20,000,000 to continue river and harbor improvement work throughout the country if an item of this character, of such vital importance to a community of almost 6,000,000 souls, to a community which has contributed more than 60 per cent of the money expended by the State of New York in the construction of a canal system that has cost $139,000,000, without any help from the Federal Government, is not to be provided for at this time. Contributing, as it does, so much toward the revenues of the Government, relying so much upon its own resources, whatever provision is made by the Congress for river and harbor improvements at this time, in my judgment, should contain the necesssary authority and money to remove Coenties Reef and thus permit the public improvements mentioned, so vital to the welfare and prosperity of the metropolis of the country, to be continued without jeopardizing the safety of the people and increasing the financial burdens that will result. So long as this bill does not provide for that improvement I shall not vote for an appropriation of $20,000,000. Rather than be a party to authorizing an expenditure of $20,000,000 for river and harbor improvements without provision for this item so vital to the interests of the city of New York, I shall vote for the amendment, which I understand has been offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], to appropriate $5,000,000 to continue only the absolutely essential maintenance work upon existing improvements. [Applause.]

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 13 minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to occupy the time of this House for 13 minutes—at least, I hope not—but I do wish to take a very few minutes to reply to some remarks made here this afternoon and also to refer briefly to one or two amendments offered.

The first amendment to which I desire to direct attention is that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. I sympathize very much with the objects and purposes of that amendment, but if we were to adopt it, as I stated this morning, we would in all probability imperil the passage of that measure in the Senate when our action goes back there for action.

I am told that if it goes back there with any amendment attached to it likely to provoke discussion, it will probably be hung up there indefinitely and likely not reach a vote in that body, which, of course, would be fatal to the proposed legislation.

Then, there is another objection to the proposed amendment, but before I go further I want to say that the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House inserted a provision, not just of that nature but which would have met the same ends sought to be gained by the amendment, but it was stricken out in the Senate and went along with other discarded items at that end of the Capitol. That provision, like this, would have extended the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission up to Rock Island, Ill. But work on the channel of the river between the mouth of the Missouri and Rock Island is now being prosecuted under a project which is in charge of the engineers and over which the Mississippi River Commission has no jurisdiction. In other words, it is a project calling for open-channel and regulation works as contradistinguished from that of levee building. This project was adopted some years ago, and appropriations have been made for it in each bill since its adoption. This bill as it left the House carried a large appropriation for the work, so that if the amendment offered were to be adopted it would, I fear, interfere materially with work under this project.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Florida yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me finish this statement, and I will be glad to do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we went to deal with the feature of levee building above the mouth of the Ohio River we inserted a separate provision from that, in which an appropriation to be expended on the lower part of the river was made, simply providing that any funds appropriated in the bill for improving the Mississippi River between Head of Passes and the mouth of the Ohio River, and which may be allotted to levees, may be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission, as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for levees upon any part of said river between Head of Passes and Rock Island, Ill., in such manner as, in their opinion, shall best improve navigation and promote the interests of commerce at all stages of the river.

It will be observed that the Mississippi River Commission under the preceding paragraph was given a sum of money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in accordance with plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers, for the general improvement of the river, for the building of levees, and so forth, thus clothing the Mississippi River Commission with the power not only to build levees but to do construction work in the river. Now, to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois would give the Mississippi River Commission like jurisdiction over the channel above the mouth of the Ohio and at least as far up as Rock Island, Ill., thus taking from the engineers the work they are now doing there; besides, it might have the effect of very seriously interfering with, if it did not make it impossible to do, the work in the river between Rock Island and St. Paul.

That is to say, we provided that the jurisdiction of the Mississippi River Commission should be extended to Rock Island, Ill., and that any money that was appropriated for the purpose of levee building in the interest, of course, of navigation should be expended by the Mississippi River Commission. Now, to adopt this particular amendment would be going beyond that provision and would take that work from the engineers, causing, no doubt, a great deal of confusion. It would take away from them the work that they are doing and would turn that open-channel work over to the Mississippi River Commission—something that we have not as yet contemplated, and something for which there is no recommendation whatever by the engineers.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will.

Mr. RAINEY. Is it not true, however, that the effect of my amendment, if adopted, would leave it optional with the Mississippi River Commission as to whether they would expend any money on the upper river or not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. RAINEY. Then, one question further. If that is true, the adoption of this amendment would not interfere with any project south of the mouth of the Ohio River. If the Mississippi River Commission wanted to spend all of this money south of the mouth of the Ohio River, they could still do it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; but it would turn over to the commission all the open-channel and other work, which was not contemplated, as the purpose was to only permit them to do levee building in the interest of navigation.

Mr. RAINEY. Is not my amendment in line with the original act creating the Mississippi River Commission, which gave them jurisdiction as far north as the headwaters of the river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; that is probably true, but since then by several acts of Congress that jurisdiction of the commission has been cut down from time to time until now it only extends upstream to the mouth of the Ohio River.

Mr. RAINEY. If my amendment should be defeated, what is going to become of this $190,000 of unexpended balance which the Mississippi River Commission has already allotted to the levees on the upper river?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was coming to that. I am not sure, I will say, Mr. Speaker, but that the Mississippi River Commission already has jurisdiction up to Rock Island. That is a legal question depending upon the construction of legislation had regarding that matter in the bill of 1913.

Mr. RAINEY. This bill now limits all expenditures to the lower river.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That depends, as I said, upon what construction is placed upon the 1913 act. It may not have been necessary, but out of abundance of caution we inserted the provision in the way I stated, but the language contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman would, I fear, repeal the project upon which we are now doing work in the upper Mississippi River, at least as far up as Rock Island.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York relating to Coenties Reef. That is a very important work, but, so far as navigation is concerned, is no more urgent than many others cut out by the Senate amendment; but still it is important that the reef be removed before the city of New York runs the tunnel through it, because if the tunnel is constructed first, the blasting that would be necessary later in order to remove the reef might destroy the tunnel, as dynamite used in blasting might destroy the tunnel; so that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors thought it wise to insert and did insert a provision in the bill appropriating $500,000 for the removal of this reef; but in the Senate it was, along with many other good provisions, eliminated; and while I sympathize very much with the city of New York, and am sorry the provision was stricken out, as it was a very meritorious one, I can not consent to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, for if we adopt that amendment we will be doing something for that project that we are not doing for any other place; we will be making an exception that we ought not to make, unless we are prepared to open up the bill all along the line. So, very reluctantly, I am compelled to oppose the amendment and for reasons just given to express the hope that it will not be adopted.

Now, just a word in regard to the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the appropriations that have been made during recent years for river and harbor improvement. For instance, the gentleman spoke of the bill of 1899 as carrying, I think, fifteen or sixteen million dollars, while, as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, that bill carried about $37,000,000.

Again, the gentleman spoke of quite a number of Congresses during which there were no appropriations at all made for rivers and harbors. He passed over in silence the year 1901, when one among the largest bills for rivers and harbors ever framed was passed by this body, with the gentleman, I presume, voting for it, as he usually votes for those measures, and very properly, too. But it went to the Senate, and there it was talked to death by a distinguished Senator who obtained the floor with the intention of killing it. This Senator talked until the 4th of March had rolled around, and the bill died on the calendar. Now, a word——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was in error and that instead of a $16,000,000 appropriation there was $38,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Thirty-seven million dollars.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say——

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the gentleman yield me some time if I answer his question?

Mr. MANN. I will. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will yield to the gentleman, anyway, and without any condition.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that the river and harbor bill of 1899 appropriated $37,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I did not say that. I said it carried that amount; but the gentleman did not call attention to the large authorization carried in that bill which is equivalent to a cash appropriation, as it comes in succeeding sundry civil bills.

Mr. MANN. That is true; I did not. But it was not appropriated at that time, nor for a considerable time after that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is a very common way gentlemen sometimes have—I will not say the gentleman from Illinois—of getting around or distracting attention from such large appropriations regarded by some as extravagant. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now, a few words with reference to the amount appropriated by the Democrats here for rivers and harbors since they have had control of this body—the gentleman spoke of some very large amount as having been appropriated since then, I have forgotten just what it was, but it was something enormous—much larger than the records will show it to have been.

I want to say that the only bills that have been passed by Congress since the Democrats have assumed control were those of 1912 and 1913, the aggregate of which footed up about $80,000,000; but from 1896 down to 1911, inclusive, the Congress during all these years being under the control of the Republican Party, appropriated—very properly, in my judgment—the large sum of about $400,000,000, while during the years that the Democrats have had the House—now nearly four—we have only appropriated $80,000,000, and in doing this we have kept within the recommendations of the engineers. In other words, the engineers have recommended every project we have adopted in this House and each sum we have appropriated for the various projects carried in each bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. I should like to ask the gentleman if he said the amount was $400,000,000 during the years that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said it was only $16,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do not recall what the gentleman from Illinois said.

Mr. DONOVAN. Do we understand the chairman of the commitee to say that $400,000,000 was spent from 1898 to 1911, inclusive, when the gentleman from Illinois wanted us to believe that it was practically only $16,000,000?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the gentleman from Connecticut is in error as to the $16,000,000.

Mr. DONOVAN. But you say $400,000,000 is correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word with reference to the amount that is now available or was available on June 30 last. Remarks have been made which would indicate that gentlemen are laboring under an erroneous impression as to that matter, and I should like to have the special attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] while I am on that subject. He repeated a remark which has been made several times, that the available balance on that date was $45,338,000, or something like that. I want to say that he has perhaps been led into error by not noticing closely the first column of the figures furnished by the War Department in Senate Document 550. The first column of this document refers to balances unexpended and to available balances. The report in the last column shows the available balance to be only $22,000,000 instead of $45,000,000, and that out of that should come $4,350,000, which pertains to works of improvement held up pending compliance with terms of cooperation on the part of local interests, and which will not be expended until those conditions have been complied with.

Now, this amount should be deducted, as it is not available for immediate use, and may not be for months and years. Deducting this would leave the apparent balance at $18,288,411, but I am told at the War Department that this apparent is not the actual available balance applicable to works contained in the rivers and harbors bill as it left the House, and that only about $9,000,000—I speak in round figures—is really available for the projects covered by the House bill, so that instead of having $45,000,000 available, as the gentlemen have said, we only have about $9,000,000. Now, I do not suppose that any gentleman intended to mislead, but that he only was mistaken by reason of not having noted carefully the difference between "balances unexpended" and "balances available," which are often quite different things.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not like to refer to politics or political parties when considering a river and harbor bill, which is a business proposition and should not be treated from a partisan standpoint. Since I first entered Congress to the present time no river and harbor bill, so far as I know, has ever been framed or considered upon political lines, and I regret to see an apparent effort here to-day to inject politics into our deliberations. But since reference has been made to the appropriations made by Congress while last under the control of the Republican Party, and a comparison sought to be made between appropriations during that period and those made since Congress passed into the control of the Democratic Party, I will here insert in my remarks the following statement, showing the amounts carried in the various river and harbor bills since and including that of 1896:

June 3, 1896	$76,195,570.37
Mar. 3, 1899	36,730,166.07
June 13, 1902	65,107,602.00
Mar. 3, 1905	35,366,533.04
Mar. 2, 1907	86,872,432.00
Mar. 3, 1909	10,071,625.00
June 25, 1910	51,945,843.50
Feb. 27, 1911	36,956,987.00
July 25, 1912	33,259,370.50
Mar. 4, 1913	47,868,894.00
Total	480,375,023.48

I do not wish it to be understood that I am finding fault with the appropriations. They were all needed, while the most of them have been expended, and that, too, upon worthy projects. But reference to them will enable anyone to see that both parties have been liberal—none too liberal, let me say—toward river and harbor improvement during the past two decades.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield, I stated all those facts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The amendment had to be offered during the debate, as I understood it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's recollection of the agreement is that anybody who made a speech could offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. While he had the floor.

Mr. MANN. I yielded to the gentleman the time which I had.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; but he did not offer the amendment when he had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has two minutes yet remaining.

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, well, if the gentleman does that——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 16, after the word "works," insert "including not to exceed $500,000 for improving East River and Hell Gate, N. Y., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 108, Sixty-third Congress, first session."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, this amendment if adopted would enable the Army Engineers to commence the work of removing Coenties Reef, to which I have already referred, through which one of the tubes of the $300,000,000 subway system in the city of New York is to be constructed. It seems to me that the House, if it intends to appropriate $20,000,000 for river and harbor work, considering the gravity of the situation and the tremendous importance of the item to the city of New York, taken into consideration with the fact that that city has contributed from 60 to 70 per cent of the $139,000,000 expended by the State of New York for the construction of a 1,000-ton barge canal without appealing to the Federal Government for aid, ought to adopt this amendment. The amendment does not increase the proposed expenditure of $20,000,000, but if adopted it would authorize the work and enable preparations to be completed and the work begun. Otherwise if the tube is completed through the reef before the necessary removal is done and afterwards the work is authorized, as it soon must be, the cost, in the opinion of the best engineers, will be enormously increased, while the safety of the tubes will be impaired. Such a situation has never existed elsewhere in the country. If this item affected some improvement desirable, important, even essential to the development of the port of New York, special effort would not be made at this time to have it included in the pending bill. But a situation unique in our history is present. A subway system unrivaled in all time has been projected, planned, authorized, and financed. Contracts have been let to successful bidders, and an improvement vitally affecting 6,000,000 people and to cost $300,000,000 has been begun. The removal of the proposed portion of this reef is imperative at this time. Refusal to act can not be justified, and the House should adopt the amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the first amendment that I offered.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, can we have that amendment reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 11, after the word "of," strike out "$20,000,000" and insert "$5,000,000."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington withdraws that amendment, and the Clerk will report the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the Senate amendment:

"That the sum of $5,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works: Provided, That allotments for maintenance from the amount hereby appropriated shall be made by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers: Provided further, That allotments for the maintenance of the Mississippi River from the Head of Passes to the mouth of the Ohio River shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in accordance with the plans, specifications, and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission as approved by the Chief of Engineers: And provided further, That at the beginning of the next session of Congress a special report shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of War showing the amount allotted under this appropriation to each work of maintenance."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, several amendments were offered to perfect the text of the Senate amendment, and those would come first before the vote on the substitute. This amendment of the gentleman from Washington is a substitute, and the other amendment would come first and the substitute next.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the gentleman's substitute was not read during the debate, and the agreement this morning was that all amendments should be offered during general debate.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Florida must have been asleep.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was read.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois as to the manner in which these votes shall be taken is correct. The substitute will be waived for the time being, and then the Chair will pass upon the points of order. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 66, line 16, by striking out the word "existing."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER:

"Page 67, line 7, after the word 'improvement,' insert 'And provided further, That of the $20,000,000 herein appropriated $750,000 shall be applied to the improvement of the Hudson River by continuing the construction of the lock and dam at Troy, N. Y.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAINEY:

"Amend by striking out, in lines 24 and 25 on page 66, the words 'the mouth of the Ohio River' and insert in lieu thereof 'Rock Island, Ill.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY) there were—ayes 46, noes 123.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FITZGERALD:

"Page 66, line 16, after the word 'works,' insert 'including not to exceed $500,000 for improving the East River and Hell Gate, N. Y., in accordance with the report submitted in House Document No. 108, Sixty-third Congress, first session.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 61, noes 136.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-seven Members present—a quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the second Humphrey substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that has been already reported.

The SPEAKER. Very well. What point of order was it that the gentleman from Florida desired to make against that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to make the point of order against the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] in the nature of a substitue.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 171, answered "present" 0, not voting 130, as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, September 30, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, September 28, 1914).

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission acknowledging the receipt of the resolution of the 28th instant, in relation to an investigation of the conditions prevailing and that have prevailed in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, or elsewhere, affecting the production, transportation, and marketing of crude petroleum, etc., which was ordered to lie on the table.

INTERLOCKING BANK DIRECTORATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, September 29, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The American Bankers' Association, composed of 15,000 banks throughout the country, the large majority of whom are small institutions, earnestly urges the injustice and impolicy of the provisions of section 8 of the Clayton antitrust bill, which prevent a person from being an officer or director in two national banks where either have deposits and capital exceeding $5,000,000, or from being a director in a smaller national bank where he is also a director in a State bank or trust company with deposits and capital exceeding $5,000,000, and also prohibits in cities of upward of 200,000 population a person from being an officer or director of a national bank who is a private banker or director or officer in any other bank. Hundreds of small national and State banks throughout the country have upon their boards of directors a man who is also an officer or director of a national bank above the $5,000,000 limitation in a larger city, and in the 28 cities with a population exceeding 200,000 there are numerous small banks in outlying districts who have upon their directorate an officer of a large bank in the same city. In every such instance the dual relationship is helpful to the smaller institution and to the community which it serves. The banks are in different localities and noncompetitive. There is no possibility of undue control or concentration of credit and nothing in such relationships which violate the spirit or purpose of the antitrust laws. The severing of these relationships would be of great detriment to all these small institutions by depriving them of the advice and judgment of men of experience, and might result in a withdrawal of capital from small communities by men who would be deprived of all voice in the management of their investments. The situation does not call for any such legislation, and the Senate, when the Clayton bill was before it, wisely adopted the report of its Judiciary Committee and entirely eliminated these provisions from the bill. They have been put back in conference and are now before the Senate. We reiterate the hardship and injustice of allowing these provisions to remain in the bill and urge that they be eliminated. We are mailing you copy of a brief which was filed before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary when the bill was before it last June, urging the entire elimination of these provisions, or, if any legislation is necessary, giving the Federal Reserve Board power to require resignations of officers in competitive institutions where any abuses are found. This brief contains extracts from letters from bankers all over the country showing actual conditions upon which the proposed provisions would injuriously operate.

COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL LEGISLATION,
By THOMAS B. PATON,
General Counsel, 5 Nassau Street.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following communication, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., September 29, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

I very much appreciate your courtesy and thank you for reading my prior telegram to the Senate. I to-day telegraphed Senator CULBERSON. If that message should fail to reach the Senator and is not read by him to the Senate, will you kindly submit to the Senate the following copy of my telegram:

"Hon. CHARLES CULBERSON,
"United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

"I note in the press dispatches this morning that you say you will discuss before the Senate to-day my attitude with reference to bank directors, and that you will contend that my testimony before the Pujo committee is not consistent with my telegram which Vice President Marshall read to the Senate on the 26th. Such comment, if indulged in by you, will not be correct. I am to-day as much opposed to interlocking bank directors of competing banks as I was when I testified before the Pujo committee. I was then and I am now opposed to legislation that will prevent banks from securing the services of men of high and tried ability and integrity who have been successful in their business just because they may happen to be directors of other banks which are not real or potential competitors. In my prior telegram I said that there was no second reason why a director of a State trust company or bank should be prohibited from being a director of a national bank, because the business of each of these two classes of banks correlates and fits in with that of the other and does not conflict or compete in any way. I respectfully submit that the question of whether banks compete or potentially compete with each other has always been the crux of my contention. My statement made at the Pujo hearing was based entirely upon a situation where there were common directors in potential competitors, and this applies to all kinds of institutions, whether business or financial. I insist that there is no valid or just reason why a director of a State bank or trust company should be prohibited from being a director in a national bank when there is no possible competition between the two institutions. I ask you in all fairness whether there is any justification for a law which permits a director of a State bank or trust company of a city of 200,000 inhabitants or less to be a director of a national bank, but if the same city should thereafter add one person to its population such directorship must immediately cease? If it be made legal to have common directors in San Antonio, Tex., why should it not be equally legal to have common directors in Portland, Oreg., whose population is just above the 200,000 mark?"

GEORGE M. REYNOLDS,
President Continental and Commercial National Bank of Chicago.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I present a telegram from George M. Reynolds, president of the Continental and Commercial National Bank of Chicago, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., September 25, 1914.

Hon. JAMES E. MARTINE,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Clayton bill, as reported by the conference committee, contains a provisions that prohibits a person from being a director of more than one bank or trust company in any city having a population of over 200,000. Such legislation is harmful and unjust to the general banking interests in this country, and tends to impair their strength and will result in weakening the personnel and standing of the directors. There are 28 cities in the United States with a population exceeding 200,000. The financial resources of the banks of these cities represent more than half of the financial strength of all the banks in this country. It is upon the banks of these cities that the burden largely rests to protect our commerce and industry. The banks of the smaller cities rely upon those in the larger cities for assistance and support. It is not right to attempt to discriminate against the banks of these 28 cities, particularly at this time when acute financial disorders prevail throughout the world. I submit that not a sound reason can be advanced why the director of a State trust company or bank should be prohibited from being a director of a national bank. State banks act as trustees, executors, administrators, and in other recognized corporate trust positions. They discharge functions that can not be exercised by national banks. The business of each of these two classes of institutions correlates and fits in with that of the other and does not conflict or compete. There are several hundred national banks which have affiliations with State trust companies or banks and have one or more common directors. The proposed legislation will introduce uncertainties, and, in my opinion, no bank legislation that is not absolutely necessary ought to be attempted at a time like this when our commercial and financial interests are greatly disturbed. Furthermore, I do not think it right to mix up an important banking question with the provisions of the Clayton bill that has to do with the regulation of trusts and monopolies. I submit these views in the interest of the people and of the banking institutions of the country generally, and not because of any peculiar hardship that the proposed legislation will work against me or the institution of which I am president. I therefore urge that the prior action of the Senate in striking out the entire provision should be maintained.

GEORGE M. REYNOLDS,
President Continental and Commercial National Bank of Chicago.

THE COPPER INDUSTRY.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 458) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed, if not incompatible with the best interests of the Government, to inform the Senate whether the British Government is interfering with export shipments of copper from American points to Rotterdam, carried in neutral bottoms, and if so, what reasons or justification are assigned by the British Government for so doing.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from Utah that it is not usual to direct the Secretary of State to transmit information.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to change "directed" to "requested." The Senator will notice that I put in the phrase "if not incompatible with the best interests of the Government."

Mr. CULBERSON. But the resolution proposes to direct the Secretary of State.

Mr. SMOOT. I say I am perfectly willing to put in the word "requested."

Mr. CULBERSON. I think that is the usual form.

Mr. SMOOT. I will modify the resolution by using the word "requested" instead of "directed."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I object unless the language is changed.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been changed, I will say to the Senator.

The resolution as modified was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS UNDER AMERICAN REGISTRY.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I understand the conference report is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES. I wish to take just three or four minutes of the time under this order, but not in connection with it, to present a petition from some of my constituents, since by taking recesses we are not able to present petitions as they should be presented.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a petition which I have received relating to the act which we passed a short time ago providing for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry. The bill was recognized by everyone as an emergency and temporary measure, and in it it was provided that the President could in his discretion, when the needs of foreign commerce required, suspend the navigation laws with reference to the employment of foreigners in connection with watch officers on ships so admitted to American registry.

I think everyone recognized that measure as a temporary measure. I think everyone felt that the President, in exercising the discretion that Congress gave him, would exercise it having in mind the conditions existing not only with reference to the necessity of having ships for the foreign trade, but also having in mind the supply of American officers for positions of that character.

I know that in the Senate we amended the bill, and I think that the amendment we put in the bill expresses the real views and real sentiments of Congress with reference to this matter. We provided that—

Whenever the President of the United States shall find that the number of available persons qualified under now existing laws and regulations of the United States to fill the respective positions of watch officers on vessels admitted to registry by this act is insufficient he is authorized to suspend by order, so far and for such time as he may find to be necessary, the provisions of law prescribing that all the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States.

There was no serious opposition to that proposition. It showed that at least the Senate was not in favor of suspending the law with reference to watch officers unless the supply of American officers was insufficient. We so expressly provided, and it seems strange that the President did not seem to take this into account in making his order. While this provision was not finally adopted, it seems to me that the whole theory and purpose of the bill would have led the President to take the available supply of qualified American officers into account.

Now, then, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that the President has issued an order suspending this law, without apparently taking into account the supply of American officers who are ready and prepared to fill these places, and also that the President has not followed the spirit of the measure as a temporary measure and suspended the law for a mere temporary period, but he has suspended the law for the period of seven years, which, in my judgment, was not contemplated by Congress when it passed the measure.

It seems to me that the suspension of the law for a period of seven years is an unreasonable suspension. Congress would never have given this unlimited power if it had thought there would be such an unreasonable extension of it. The petition which I have shows that not only is the suspension for an unreasonable period, but also that it has not taken into account the supply of American officers to fill these positions, which, in my judgment, it was clearly the intention and expectation of Congress that the President would do. As it is, the United Fruit Co., the Standard Oil Co., and those other companies who have been sailing under foreign flags during times of peace may now, when danger threatens, come in under the American flag and keep them officered for seven years with foreigners, while American citizens, well qualified for these positions, must go unemployed.

I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read the resolution of the American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, Puget Sound Harbor, No. 16, Seattle, Wash.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas by Executive order dated the 4th day of September, 1914, the President did, by virtue of the act of Congress approved August 18, 1914, entitled "An act to provide for the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry for the foreign trade, and for other purposes," suspend the provisions of the law prescribing that the watch officers of vessels of the United States registered for foreign trade shall be citizens of the United States, so that foreign-built ships which shall be admitted to United States registry under the act may retain their watch officers without regard to citizenship for seven years from date of the act, and such officers shall be eligible for promotion; and prescribing that vacancies occurring among such officers within two years may be filled without regard to citizenship, but that vacancies occurring thereafter shall be filled by a watch officer who is a citizen of the United States; and

Whereas the said Executive order works injustice upon the American watch officers and the American public for the following reasons:

1. There are on the Pacific coast alone 500 American licensed officers out of employment, and these men have no opportunity to get employment on the vessels admitted to registry under this act for the reason that such vessels will retain their old crews.

2. There will be no opportunity for an American officer to get employment on one of these vessels until a vacancy occurs in one of the lower positions two years hence.

3. The American shipper and passenger will, if he uses one of these vessels, run the risk of the unseaworthiness and the other defects of the vessel due to lack of inspection and the inferior abilities of foreign officers in charge, with none of the restrictions as to hours of labor and other humane regulations in force on American vessels: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by Puget Sound Harbor No. 16, American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, Seattle, Wash., That the President be, and he hereby is, requested to so modify this Executive order as to provide that when it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Department of Commerce that the available supply of licensed American officers is practically exhausted, and that the vessels under American registry can not be manned without the issuance of licenses to officers who are not citizens of the United States, that in that event and only then shall licenses be issued to such officers who are not citizens; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President and the Secretary of Commerce and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State, and that the latter be urged to use their influence with the President to procure a modification of said Executive order in accordance with the views expressed in this resolution.

Adopted unanimously at regular meeting held September 21, 1914.

[SEAL.] S. A. CHAPIN, President.

Attest: P. MULLEN, Secretary.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Lea, Tenn.	Perkins	Sterling
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Pittman	Swanson
Chilton	Lippitt	Ransdell	Thompson
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Robinson	Thornton
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Walsh
Hughes	Myers	Sheppard	West
James	Nelson	Shields	White
Jones	Norris	Simmons
Kern	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Lane	Page	Smoot

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I desire to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] by leave of the Senate, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. REED, Mr. VARDAMAN, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] are unavoidably absent from the Senate, and that they are paired, respectively, with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. STONE, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the subject matter of this bill has been so amply and comprehensively discussed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that there is really not much for me to say on the subject. Were it not for the fact that I was a member of the conference committee, and that I was unable to agree with that committee and to unite with them in the conference report, I should remain silent.

In my opinion, Mr. President, aside from what I call the labor provisions and the provisions relating to injunctions, in all other respects the conference committee has greatly emasculated and diluted the bill. In its remedial features the bill is entirely inferior to the original House bill and to the bill as it passed the Senate. Many of the important remedial features of the House bill have been eliminated, and many important features in the Senate bill have been eliminated. I propose, with the leave of the Senate, to proceed to take the bill up by sections, to discuss each section separately, and to show what has been done by the conference committee, and to what the action of the conferees leads.

Section 1 of the bill relates simply to definition of phrases and terms, and I will not spend any time on that.

Section 2 is one of the most material and important sections in the bill. In the Senate the section was entirely eliminated on the theory that it was a subject matter that properly belonged to the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission laws, and that the Trade Commission ought to take charge of that matter. It has been restored by the conference report, but in a greatly diluted and weakened form; in fact, with all the vitality taken out of it. Let me call your attention now to section 2 as it read in the House bill:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall either directly or indirectly discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States—with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller.

Now, listen to this language—

The gist of the section in the House bill is the inhibition against discrimination in prices for the purpose of ruining or destroying a competitor. Such discrimination was declared to be an offense, and in the House bill a penal provision was made to apply to it.

Now, what have the conference committee done in this matter, Mr. President? They have not only eliminated the penal provision of the section but they have injected a provision into it that makes it utterly worthless and nugatory as a protection to the individual against whom the discrimination is made. They struck out these words, "with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor," and in their place they have inserted these words, "where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce."

What does that mean? Under that provision the Standard Oil Co. or any other company can, by unfair price discrimination, drive a dealer utterly out of business and ruin him, and yet when he goes to court and his case comes to trial, although he may prove that he has been utterly ruined and destroyed by price discrimination, unless he can make it appear that the effect in his case may have been to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce he is without remedy; in other words, he must not only prove that he has been obliterated from the map, that he has been destroyed, but he must go a step further. He must, in addition, prove that the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

How can a poor fellow make that kind of proof? Here, for example, is a merchant engaged in trade in a given place; he is subject to this unfair method of competition and is driven out of business by unjust discrimination. He may be only a small trader, a mere drop in the bucket, a mere dipper in the waters of the Potomac in respect to the general trade of the country, and yet, although he is extinguished and obliterated, unless he can show that the crushing out of his little business and the destruction of his little industry affects the general result and substantially lessens competition and tends to create monopoly in any line of commerce there is no remedy.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I will ask the Senator to wait a minute until I finish this thought. That is not all. While section 11 allows such a case to be brought before the Trade Commission, where the injured party may have a hearing, and may afterwards go into court, by this amendment you have hamstrung both the Trade Commission and the court, because in every instance they must find not only that this man has been driven out of business by unfair competition but they must find that the effect of driving a single individual out of trade and business has been substantially to lessen competition or has tended to create a monopoly "in any line of commerce." I want to call your attention to another matter in this connection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the word "and" or the word "or" used there?

Mr. NELSON. It reads:

Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then the word "or" is used and not "and."

Mr. NELSON. Now, can not Senators see how difficult it will be for an humble trader, a single individual in a given place, to show that the effect of driving him out of business has tended to lessen competition in that line of commerce or has led to a monopoly in that line of commerce?

Now, can not Senators see how difficult it will be for an humble trader, a single individual in a given place to show that the effect of driving him out of business has tended to lessen competition in that line of commerce or has led to a monopoly in that line of commerce?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be just as difficult to prove the purpose or intent specified in the House provision as it would be in the provision of the bill as reported by the conference committee? In the case of the House bill the resort to price discrimination must have been—

With the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller.

Now, the bill as reported by the conference committee does not say that you must prove a purpose or intent. It does not relegate the man to the difficult thing of proving the intent of the guilty party, but it says:

Where the effect of such discrimination—

Not "will be," but—may be to substantially lessen competition.

Now, that is not all:

Or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

It does seem to me that the one is more easily proven than the other.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is laboring under a confusion of ideas. In the House bill the provision is that driving a competitor out of business by discrimination, if it is done with the intent to do it, is obnoxious to the law, whereas in the other case it is not a question of intent at all, and there is where the Senator confuses it. It is a question of what is the effect of the particular act.

Take, for instance, a dealer in the little town where I live, a place of 3,000 people, who is engaged in selling illuminating oil. The Standard Oil Co. goes to work and drives him out of business in the city of Alexandria, Minn., by unjust discriminations in that locality. It is a clear case—as clear as may be. He is utterly obliterated from the map as a dealer in oil. Yet that poor fellow, if he comes into court and seeks relief under the provisions of this bill as amended by the conference committee, must show that the effect of obliterating him in the little town of Alexandria is to substantially lessen competition, or that it tends to create a monopoly in that line of commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. If he is destroyed, would not that lessen competition or tend to lessen competition?

Mr. NELSON. It would be so slight that it would be very difficult to prove. It would be like a dipper of water poured into the Potomac.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a competitor put out of business. That is lessening competition, is it not?

Mr. NELSON. Well, it would be so slight that it would not be appreciable. It would not be a substantial lessening of competition or the creation of a monopoly.

Mr. OVERMAN. How would it be slight when the man was absolutely driven out of business?

Mr. NELSON. It is not in reference to his business; it is in reference to the effect on the trade and commerce in that line in general.

Mr. OVERMAN. That means the trade and commerce of that town.

Mr. NELSON. The Trade Commission could have given relief in this case, and that is why the Senator left it out of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will my colleague pardon an interruption?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAPP. I may anticipate my colleague, but right in that connection I desire to say that in the States where they have tried a prohibition against local underselling involving the intent to destroy they have no difficulty whatever in enforcing it. Among other States is the State which the Senator and myself have the honor to represent in this body. It is easy to prove that you have driven a man out of business when it is very hard to prove that that lessens competition; and if one is as effective as the other, I should like my colleague to pardon me while I make the inquiry, Why did you not leave in the one which had been demonstrated to be simple and effective?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will answer that by saying that the Senate itself struck out that section; and the Senator from Minnesota did not protest, as I recollect, or vote against it. The Senate as a body struck out that whole section here upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator did protest.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not think the Senator from Minnesota did. I beg his pardon. Anyway, the Senate struck out that section.

Mr. NELSON. The Senate struck it out, as I understood, on the theory that it was a proper subject for the Trade Commission; that it would come under the head of unfair methods of competition. I am inclined to think that theory was correct; but while section 11 of this conference bill provides that the Trade Commission may have jurisdiction of such cases, as in the cases of unjust methods of competition, yet you have hamstrung the commission and the court by requiring not only proof that a person has been driven out of business by unjust discrimination but also proof that the effect of driving that individual out of business has been substantially to lessen competition or to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

In this connection I desire to call attention to another fact. Ex industria, in many provisions of this bill the conferees have injected a new phrase, unknown to the antitrust law. They have used the words "substantially" or "substantial" in many places. You will find that in many instances—the phrase "substantially lessen competition." You will find that time and again. That leaves a new question for the future corporation lawyer and for the judges over their midnight oil to determine, What is the meaning of the word "substantial" or "substantially"?

It was for some time commonly understood by the legal profession that the Supreme Court, in the Standard Oil case, injected the word "reasonable" or "unreasonable" into the Sherman Antitrust Act. It is doubtful whether the court really did so; but in any event in the Tobacco case Chief Justice White in his opinion cleared that matter up. I quote from his opinion in the case of United States v. The American Tobacco Co. (221 U. S.). Here is what he said, after commenting on the opinion in the Standard Oil case:

> In other words, it was held not that acts which the statute prohibited could be removed from the control of its prohibitions by a finding that they were reasonable—

Now, listen to that—

> In other words, it was held not that acts which the statute prohibited could be removed from the control of its prohibitions by a finding that they were reasonable, but that the duty to interpret which inevitably arose from the general character of the term "restraint of trade" required that the words "restraint of trade" should be given a meaning which would not destroy the individual right to contract, and render difficult, if not impossible, any movement of trade in the channels of interstate commerce the free movement of which it was the purpose of the statute to protect.

So you see, if you study that phrase of the judge's opinion, that he does not hold any longer, if he ever did, in the Standard Oil case, that it was a question of "reasonable" or "unreasonable" restraint of trade.

What does the antitrust law provide? It provides that any restraint or any monopoly is obnoxious to the law. Now you have injected into this statute the word "substantially." We have gotten rid of the word "reasonable," according to the expression of Chief Justice White in the Tobacco case, but now you are injecting a new term into it; and that raises the question as to what "substantial" or "substantially" means. What is a "substantial" lessening of competition? That phrase has been injected into this bill ex industria in a great many points, and it tends greatly to weaken it, to lead to confusion, and to further hairsplitting arguments. There is no such qualification in the antitrust law. It does not say "substantially to restrain trade" or "substantially to create a monopoly."

I conclude my remarks on section 2 by reiterating again that by injecting this condition into it you have actually destroyed its effectiveness as a remedial statute for the individual who suffers from unjust discrimination and whose business has been destroyed by such discrimination.

I submit that if we intend to legislate so as to afford remedies to the public; if we intend, as has been proclaimed and given out from the housetops, to strengthen the antitrust law, give ampler remedies to the public, and aid that law in its enforcement, the poorest way to do it is to emasculate it and dilute it, as we have done in the case of section 2 of the conference bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator leaves that point, if he was about it leave it, or had concluded——

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. REED. I should like to offer a suggestion, partially in reply to the inquiry which was made by some Senator, and which was to the effect that the language of the House bill, which I quote—

> With the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor—

Is a broader qualification than the conferees' language, which is:

> Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Mr. President, under the House section—and I adopt the illustration of the Senator from Minnesota—if the Standard Oil Co. were to go into the Senator's town and cut the price of gasoline and coal oil to 3 or 4 cents a gallon less than it was selling for in an adjoining town, the dealer in that city who represented an independent company could bring a suit, could show the simple facts I have recited, and from those facts a jury would be warranted in finding the intent to injure the representative of the independent concern, and a judgment bottomed upon such evidence would stand. The case would be narrowed merely to a question as to whether there had been a local price-cutting, unexcused, the effect of which would be to destroy the business of that particular individual. Under the language adopted by the conferees it must be shown, not that there was a substantial lessening of competition in one community by the driving out of one man, but that there was a substantial lessening of competition in that line of commerce.

Now, let us analyze it. What is that line of commerce? That line of commerce is the sale of hundreds of thousands, of millions of dollars' worth of oil all over the world. No court would be warranted in saying that the mere driving out of one dealer in the little town where the Senator lives has substantially lessened the competition in that business which is spread over the world, and you could not make out a case by the proof that one man had been destroyed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator. It was the thought I intended to convey which he has expressed more clearly and emphatically than I did.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest, along the same line, that the means by which this wrong would be done in the instance cited by the Senator from Missouri would be by competition, so that perhaps the fact would be disclosed that there was more competition than there had been before. It is a ruinous competition, which I understand we are trying to avoid by law, that is used to drive the man out.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I supposed it was the purpose and intention to protect individuals against ruinous competition.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. That evidently was the purpose of the Trade Commission law.

Mr. NORRIS. That evidently is the purpose of the House provision in section 2.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. The House provision is perfectly clear and a good provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but in the case of the provision of the conferees, as I understand it, where they say that you would have to show, among other things, that "the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition," the competition while they were driving a man out of business would be greater than it ever was before. They would not be able to show that, although the damage would be going on, and it would be ruinous competition while they were doing it.

Mr. NELSON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the House bill the words after "United States," namely, "with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller," are entirely obliterated.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course they are, together with——

Mr. NELSON. And you are not only thrown back on the question what effect driving that one little dealer out of business has upon competition in that line of trade—illuminating oil, for instance—but you are driven back to the question of monopoly; and in order to make it still worse they put in the word "substantially." It must be a substantial lessening of competition. In the great aggregate of trade of the Standard Oil Co. throughout this country, how could the fact that a little dealer in the city of Alexandria, my home, has been driven out of the oil business be regarded as a substantial lessening of competition in the line of Standard Oil commerce?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; for a question.

Mr. CHILTON. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that both he and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] fail to put the proper emphasis upon the words "may be." I know he wants to do justice to this section. I believe he does.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to call his attention to the fact that in the one you must do the difficult thing of proving an intent.

That is the provision of the House bill. You must prove an intent.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. Now, the conferees adopted the more logical, the more scientific method, and the one adopted by most of the States, of forbidding the act, not where the effect is or shall be to create monopoly, but where the effect may be and where the tendency is to create monopoly. I respectfully submit that that is easily proved.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that I am not an artist in the matter of elocution, and perhaps not capable of putting the proper emphasis on the particular words that ought to be emphasized; but the language as an entirety is perfectly clear. What can be clearer than this: Where the effect of a discrimination against John Jones as an individual may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly in any line of commerce——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to have endless interruptions. I want to get a chance to make a statement now and then. I have no doubt it worries the Senator, and I will give him a chance later on.

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator will pardon me, he misquoted the section. It is not where the effect of injuring John Jones is, but where the effect of the act is. The Senator ought to be fair about it.

Mr. NELSON. There is no use quibbling about terms. It is where the effect of driving him out of business by discrimination is to substantially lessen competition or to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

As I said, take the matter of the trade in illuminating oil. How can you make out a case where a little dealer in my home town of Alexandria is driven out of business in illuminating oil by the great Standard Oil Co.? He is driven out of the business by unjust discrimination. He is utterly deprived of every relief, and he comes into court and shows that fact. They will say here that is not enough. You must show that driving you out of business has substantially lessened competition and created a monopoly in that line of commerce. That is what it means.

Now, if you had left that condition out, if you had left this section, even with the penal clause out of it, as it came from the House, and then remitted it to the Trade Commission under section 5, it would have afforded a remedy; but by injecting this amendment you have hamstrung the Trade Commission, you have hamstrung the court to enforce the order, and you have made it practically of no value.

What you have done in respect to section 2 you have done in respect to section 3 of the bill. In that case you have even done worse. There are a number of patentees in this country who, in order to create a monopoly and to get undue advantages of the public, not only seek to control the article on which they have secured patents, but in connection with it they require the patentees to buy from them certain nonpatented articles, certain supplies for operating the patented machine with. We have an illustration of one of that kind of contracts in the case of Henry v. Dick Co., found in Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States. It related to a mimeograph. The mimeograph was sold with these conditions:

> This machine is sold by the A. B. Dick Co. with the licensed restriction that it may be used only with the stencil paper, ink, and other supplies made by A. B. Dick Co.

There you have a clear instance of what we call a tying contract, and there are a great many such cases. There are the tabulating-machine company, the shoe-machinery company, the mimeograph company, and I do not know how many others resorting to this method.

The Supreme Court in a labored opinion, five of the justices concurring, held such a contract of sale to be valid. I will read from the syllabus two paragraphs on that point. Three of the justices, including Chief Justice White, dissented. Justice Day did not participate in the case. Here is the syllabus of what they decided:

> While an absolute and unconditional sale operates to pass the patented article outside of the boundaries of the patent, a patentee may by a condition of sale so restrict the use of his vendee within specific boundaries of time, place, or method as to make prohibited uses outside of those boundaries constitute infringement and not mere breach of collateral contract.
> A patentee may exclude others from the use of his invention although he does not use it himself.
> Although a contract in regard to use of a patent may include interstate commerce and restrain interstate trade, if it involves only the reasonable and legal conditions composed under the patent law it is not within the prohibitions of the Sherman Act.

In other words, they held that such a tying contract as that was valid; that the party who bought that mimeograph was required to buy his stencils, his ink, all the materials that he used with that machine from this company, and all those articles were unpatented.

In the Senate we adopted the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], a carefully drawn amendment, calculated to reach this precise evil. It was section 2 of our bill as we passed it. It reads:

> SEC. 2. That it shall not be lawful to insert or incorporate a condition in any contract relating to the sale or lease of or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, or the effect of which will be to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire from the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, any article or class of articles not protected by the patent; and any such conditions—> and any such conditions shall be null and void.

There was something effective, there was something that created an absolute remedy, by declaring that such tying contracts as the one I have read here from the decision of the Supreme Court were absolutely void, and that ended the matter.

But what transpired in the conference? That beneficent provision, incorporated at the instance of the Senator from Montana, was eliminated, and in lieu of that a milk-and-water provision was inserted. Not only was the provision of the House inserted, but they added to it the same attachment that they added to section 2. Let me read it:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person—

This is the conferees section—

> SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia, or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller.

That was the language of the original House bill, and the original House bill had a penal provision. It held that any man who violated the provision should be subject to a penalty.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator wants to be fair.

Mr. NELSON. Wait until I get through and I will explain that.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator said that was the original language of the House bill. The Senator is mistaken about that, because the Senate added "whether patented or unpatented."

Mr. NELSON. I am calling attention to the penal provision. The only change we made in the bill as it was reported from the committee was to strike out the penalty provision and put in the words "whether patented or unpatented."

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. NELSON. That is what the Judiciary Committee did. Now, what have they done in conference? They have not been content to leave the House bill, which was, under the circumstances, not as good as the amendment of the Senator from Montana; not as drastic and effective as that, but still there was some meat in it. But what have they done? They have taken the amendment with those words that we put into it in the Senate, "whether patented or unpatented," and they have hamstrung it with this same attachment that they added to section 2, and they have added this to it:

> Where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially—

Here is the word "substantially" again. You will find that all through—> to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

In other words, to make out a case you must establish in every instance the fact that the effect of that tying contract may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

Mr. CLAPP. In any line of commerce.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; in any line of commerce. Of course that means in that line of commerce. It can not refer to anything else.

Now, can you see how that weakens it? By another provision of this bill the Trade Commission is given jurisdiction of it. But the commission in order to afford relief must not only find that there is such a contract of sale or lease as is specified in section 3, as adopted by the conference, but they must go a step further and find that the effect of that tying contract is substantially to lessen competition and to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Mr. CHILTON. The language is not "is," but "may be."

Mr. NELSON. "May be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly." The words "may be" do not mean any different from the word "is." You can not put any other construction on it where the effect of it may be and where the effect of it is. So in every one of these cases——

Mr. OVERMAN. Right there will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator said, which is true, that this matter is referred to the Trade Commission finally to administer. There are four or five men sitting on that bench to decide the case. The Senator says that the word "is" and the words "may be" are the same. If the Senator was on the bench to decide a case, take the Oil case, he would have the widest discretion to see whether it may be, not that it does it, but that it is the tendency to do it. It gives the discretion.

Mr. NELSON. Whichever the case may be.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. A new condition has been injected into it. In the one case as the section came from the House of Representatives and as it was in the House bill you left it simply as a question of fact to determine whether such tying contracts had been made; and if there was such a tying contract, then it could be stopped or canceled by the commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not a question of fact, it is a question of the opinion of the board whether that may have the effect; that is all. It is not whether it is, but whether it may have that effect. It leaves the discretion to the Trade Commission to decide.

Mr. NELSON. You are taking out the virtue and effect of it. Instead of affording protection in any individual case or in any individual locality, you are making it general as to what effect it has on the general trade or commerce of the country in that line. The effect of such contract was not embraced in the House bill. The only question left by that bill was the fact of the existence of the inhibited contract.

Even if you had eliminated the penal provision from the House section as it came to us and left in the words "whether patented or unpatented" and then referred it to the Trade Commission, they would have had a simple case. It would have been simply a question of fact—has such a tying contract been made, and is it an unfair method of competition? But now you have added another condition. It will be no longer sufficient to prove the existence of the contract, but in order to get relief you must also prove that the effect of it is to substantially lessen competition or to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

I might elaborate this subject further, but it is sufficient to say on this point that by injecting into these two sections—2 and 3—these conditions as to the effect you have deprived the party injured of any direct remedy and relief and have merely remitted him to the relief given under the antitrust law. As remedial measures, these two sections, as diluted by the conferees, might as well be excluded from the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Would the Senator care at this time to hear the opinion of the United Shoe Machinery Co. of section 3 as written here?

Mr. NELSON. I have not the case here.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator if he would care to hear the opinion of this company with reference to section 3 as it is written here at this time?

Mr. NELSON. A private letter? No; I do not care to have it. I only know this, I want to say to the Senator from Texas, the chairman of the committee, that in all my experience I never found more lobbying about any piece of legislation than I did about this matter of tying contracts. I was approached by both men and women on the subject, and they were very restless. They particularly dreaded the amendment that was injected into the bill by the Senator from Montana, and in order that they could escape from that they affected to be opposed to the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator does not, however, answer my question as to whether he would care to hear at this time the opinion of this company with reference to section 3.

Mr. NELSON. I prefer not to have it injected at this time. I do not want to be discourteous to the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is not any discourtesy.

Mr. NELSON. I prefer not to have it injected at this time.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says there was lobbying about this matter. Does he not know that these people now are protesting more vigorously than they have ever done before against the way we have written this bill?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no; the protest was against the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. OVERMAN. But since we have adopted the amendment has not the Senator been approached repeatedly?

Mr. NELSON. No, no, no.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a list of them here.

Mr. NELSON. In their bosoms and hearts they say amen. They affect to be greatly chagrined, but it is only an affected matter. What they dreaded was the drastic and effective amendment of the Senator from Montana, which would have effected a complete cure; and now, in order to retire like a rear guard, they fire off their arms and say, "Oh, even this amendment is horrible; we can not stand it." But what they dreaded was the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

Section 4 of the conference bill is simply a reenactment of section 7 of the antitrust bill; nothing more, nothing less. Section 5 relates to the effect of judgments or decrees as evidence. As that amendment was perfected and prepared by the Senate committee it was a good and effective amendment. I think the House provision which made the judgments and decrees in such cases conclusive evidence in other cases was undoubtedly unconstitutional. But the Senate provided, in lieu thereof, in section 5, that a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

That was a provision which the Senate put into the bill. The conferees not only struck out the word "heretofore"—and there may have been some reason for that—but inserted the two following provisos:

Provided, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken: Provided further, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity now pending in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

These provisos deal tenderly with the great trusts and monopolies, who, knowing that they are guilty, can come into court, plead guilty, and say, "We have violated the law; we admit our guilt; we will agree to a consent decree; but these decrees must not be used in other suits against us where a private individual has been injured by the trust." Where he brings his suit under section 7 of the antitrust law to recover triple damages against a trust and a monopoly, he can not have the benefit of such decrees or judgments.

See what a great hardship that involves? It is always difficult in the prosecution of cases against such trusts and monopolies as the Standard Oil Co., the Tobacco Trust, the Sugar Trust, the Steel Trust, and others, to get the necessary and proper evidence. The Government oftentimes spends months and even years, through an army of inspectors going all over the country, to gather the facts and secure the testimony in such cases. At great expense, with great labor, and with great loss of time this evidence is secured and accumulated. After the court has decreed and determined that the Sugar Trust is a monopoly; that the Steel Trust is a monopoly, that it is existing in violation of the antitrust law, that it is a restraint of interstate commerce, that it is a monopoly in interstate commerce, when the poor litigant goes into court under section 7 of the antitrust law to seek his remedy for triple damages, why should he be compelled to scour the country to get that evidence? Why should you put him to that trouble? If the defendant has plead guilty in a suit brought by the Government of the United States and has admitted that it has violated the law, why, in Heaven's name, should not that poor individual litigant get the benefit of that admission? Why should he be put to the great expense and trouble of hunting up evidence to prove that the trust has violated the antitrust law when the trust has plead guilty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator from Minnesota from what section he is reading?

Mr. NELSON. I am quoting from section 5. The conferees have added the words I am about to quote, and I will tell you what this provision covers. It is the poor little infant trusts which these provisos protect. Let me read them:

Provided, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken—

Listen to this—

Provided further, This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity, now pending, in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

This, of course, it is argued will be an inducement for them to come into court and plead guilty. If they shall all be treated as the Tobacco Trust was treated in its final dissolution, I do not wonder that they are ready to come into court and plead guilty. Let me read you a list of the cases of the poor, innocent trusts that are relieved by these provisos; this list is from the office of the Attorney General: "At present there are pending suits under the antitrust act against the International Harvester Co., the United States Steel Corporation, the Reading system of railroads and coal companies, the Lehigh Valley system of railroads and coal companies, the United Shoe Machinery Co."—that is one of the companies which is protected by section 3 of the conference report, which has emasculated and diluted section 4—" the American Sugar Refining Co., the American Can Co., the Corn Products Co., the Southern Pacific Co., the Eastman Kodak Co., and the International Cash Register Co." All these poor orphans come under the beneficent provisions of this section. I have no doubt, if this becomes a law, they will feel like pleading guilty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he can explain the meaning of the last proviso, which reads:

Provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

What does that mean?

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will take the whole paragraph together he will plainly see its meaning. We will suppose a suit has been commenced against one of these companies; that they have taken a little testimony—and in some of these cases, notably the Steel Trust case, they have taken a good deal of testimony; I do not know but that the most of it is taken—but this provides that if they should come in and acquiesce in a consent decree, without continuing the taking of testimony, the decree can not be used against them by any other party.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that this very proviso implies that it is customary to take testimony after the decree is rendered. Of course the decree is rendered after the taking of testimony, except in supplementary proceedings to enforce or carry out the decree.

Mr. NELSON. That is the first proviso; but the second proviso relates to cases where decrees have not been rendered, where only a part of the testimony has been taken.

Mr. NORRIS. Does it mean that in the cases that are now pending the trusts may come in and plead guilty before they take all their testimony—that after this law is passed it will apply to them?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, certainly; and that you can not use the judgment itself in a suit brought by anyone else.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but after the passage of this bill—assuming that it becomes a law—if some additional evidence is taken this exemption would not apply, as I understand it. Is that what it means?

Mr. NELSON. If they do not plead guilty without taking further evidence, they do not get the benefit.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, as soon as this bill is enacted and becomes a law, in every case then pending it will be up to the defendants to decide whether they are going to consent to a judgment or whether they are going to take further testimony; and if they take more testimony after the law is passed, then this proviso does not apply to them?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is so.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that the Senator's understanding?

Mr. NELSON. If they take more evidence it would not apply, of course; but there are two provisos here, as the Senator will observe. One of those provisos reads:

This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken.

That is one proviso. The next proviso reads:

This section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity now pending in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded—

And so forth.

The argument in favor of those provisions is that it will induce the parties to come in and plead guilty; and, as was well said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in his magnificent argument, why should not the private litigant have the benefit of this plea of guilty? A consent decree is nothing more nor less than an admission of guilt. And why should not the poor private litigant, who comes in under section 7 and seeks to recover damages for the special injury that has been done to him, have the benefit of this admission?

I now come to the next section which I desire to take up.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the section he has been discussing——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. This section simply provides:

That a final judgment or decree hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant—

And so forth.

Does not the Senator think, notwithstanding the proviso to which he has referred, if this bill shall pass, that the judgment in a suit hereafter commenced could be offered and would be proper evidence, although it might not establish a prima facie case?

Mr. NELSON. I do not think so, unless the parties should be the same.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be true; but what I mean is this: While I agree with the Senator that the proviso ought not to be in the bill at all, still, the proviso being in, it would not necessarily follow that on account of the proviso a judgment could not be offered as evidence if it were otherwise admissible.

Mr. NELSON. The effect of a judgment would not be restricted under the general law; but the Senator from Nebraska, who himself has been a judge, knows very well that where there is not an identity of parties the judgment could not be used.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but I do not think the Senator gets my idea. What I wanted to get the Senator's opinion on was this: Notwithstanding the proviso, which says that the section shall not apply to certain cases, suppose that in all other respects it was proper to offer a judgment in evidence and there was no reason why it should not be admitted, assuming that in other respects the judgment is proper evidence, then this proviso would not exclude it, as I understand.

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. NORRIS. The only thing about this is that it would not establish a prima facie case.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator can see—and if not, I desire to call his attention to the fact—that this section without these provisos is a highly remedial section. It makes the decision in cases against trusts and monopolies prima facie evidence in a suit brought by a private individual against that monopoly; in other words, by making such a judgment prima facie evidence the burden of proof is shifted.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. In the absence of evidence to the contrary that decree will be sufficient evidence in a suit by an individual for triple damages under section 7 to prove that the trust has violated the antitrust law, that it is a monopoly, and that it has been guilty of restraining interstate commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand there is nothing in this proposed act that deprives any citizen of any right he now has under the law.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator regret that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely make that suggestion to the Senator. I am not regretting it, of course, because suits have been brought in my State without any prima facie evidence provision or without any conclusive-evidence provision, and damages have been recovered. I think the Senator will agree with me that there is nothing in this act that would deprive any citizen of any right that he now has to bring a suit under section 7 of the antitrust law.

Mr. NELSON. There is nothing to prevent him from bringing a suit under section 7.

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not interfere with any right he has at present.

Mr. NELSON. It does not interfere with any right, but we were supposed to be giving the poor fellow some value received by this law. We proposed to give him a remedy by this section. What was the remedy we proposed to give him before the section was spoiled by these provisos? The unconditional remedy we proposed to give him was that where the Federal Government had instituted a suit against a trust or monopoly and had obtained a judgment or decree against it, declaring it to be guilty of violating the antitrust law, an individual litigant could come into court and get the benefit of that decree and be relieved from the trouble of securing evidence to establish the facts that were involved in the judgment.

Mr. OVERMAN. This act does that as to all future cases.

Mr. NELSON. That is true of all future cases, but in respect to pending cases it is not true. I want to say to the Senator that it is my candid opinion that with these two laws—the Trade Commission law and the one we are about to enact—there will be very few prosecutions under the antitrust law. These two laws together will be the shield under which the trusts and monopolies will crawl in the future. They will always come in and say, "Oh, I am prosecuted under the Clayton antitrust law," or, "I am followed up under the Trade Commission law. For the Lord's sake, do not prosecute me under the Sherman antitrust law."

Mr. NORRIS. They will not be prosecuted under this law, because the criminal provisions are all taken out of it.

Mr. NELSON. I will next call the attention of the Senate to section 6, the labor section. I will read it. The first sentence is unique:

SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws.

All but the first sentence of this section is exactly the law now. I am not aware that a single suit has ever been brought in any court to dissolve a labor organization as being in violation of existing law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator doubtless recognizes, I dare say, that the conference report on the bill as to that section is identical with the section as adopted by the Senate? No change whatever was made by the conferees in that section.

Mr. NELSON. I am aware of that fact, but I am calling attention to the bad features of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. But not the bad features of the conference report itself.

Mr. NELSON. I am calling attention to the bad features of this bill in general.

The labor organizations have been seeking for this legislation. It is simply declaratory of what our courts have decided time and again. No court has ever decided that it is illegal, nor has it ever been held illegal, for such organizations to exist. Labor organizations are like corporations—so long as they keep within the pale of the law and do not undertake to violate the law they are legal; and there has been no attempt, as I have said, to break up a labor organization as such by any court or in any judicial proceeding, so far as I know.

There have also been included in the provision agricultural societies and farmers. There is not a single farmer in the State of Minnesota who has ever asked me to assist in securing the enactment of any such legislation; but to give a sort of color to it, and to show that something else than labor organizations has been included, agricultural societies and horticultural organizations have been embraced within the provisions of the section; but, as I have said, all but the first sentence, which was injected into the bill on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], during its consideration in the Senate, is nothing more than declaratory of the present law. However, this unique provision is in the section:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce.

Until this moment I have always supposed that the labor of a workingman was his chief capital, and that his labor was as much entitled to protection as his trowel and his hammer. To put labor outside of the pale of the law, as this provision does, seems to be a unique piece of legislation. It is a sort of Pope's bull against the comet. It is a fulmination of an academic character. The purpose of those who inserted it was to establish the principle that the right to labor, the right to carry on labor, and to do business is not a matter of commerce, and is not therefore subject to the protection of the Constitution of the United States, because the power of Congress under the Constitution is limited to interstate commerce; and, undoubtedly, back of this peculiar amendment is the purpose to have this declaration, so that labor organizations and laboring men can not be reached because of the constitutional provision limiting the power of Congress to the regulation of interstate commerce.

If I were a laboring man—and to some extent I still am, and my heart beats with that of the laboring man—if I were a laboring man to-day, living by the sweat of my brow, working in any trade or employment, I should feel it an insult to me to have such a declaration put into the law.

Why do we protect laboring men on the railroads by safety-appliance laws and by other laws for the welfare of the men who operate railroads? If they are not within the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, what right have we to protect them?

I am surprised at the leaders of labor organizations being satisfied with such a taffy of a declaration. I do not think the rank and file of the labor organizations are with them or ask for this.

Aside from that first sentence, however, there is no objection to that section; it is merely declaratory of the existing law.

I come next to section 7 of the bill. It relates to two matters. The first part of it prohibits one corporation engaged in commerce from acquiring, directly or indirectly, the stock or shares of another corporation where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition. In the Senate amendment we struck out the word "substantially." Here is the way it left the Senate:

Where the effect of such acquisition may be to lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition.

And here again, ex industria, the conferees have injected the word "substantially" before the words "lessen competition." It is not enough if it lessens competition; it must be a substantial lessening before it is subject to the provisions of this section.

We come next to holding companies, in the same section; and in respect to holding companies they have injected the same word. That is, a holding company is obnoxious to the law if it substantially lessens competition. The word "substantially" is injected again. They have many exceptions in the case of these holding companies, however, and they are most dangerous exceptions.

This section shall not apply to corporations purchasing such stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the "substantial" lessening of competition.

As long as there is no "substantial" lessening of competition holding companies, for stock manipulating purposes, may continue to exist.

This permits a holding company to buy the stock of any other company and hold it as a matter of investment, and unless you can show that it has been done for the purpose of "substantially" lessening competition the company is not liable.

Then there is another exception to this provision in relation to the construction of branch lines or feeders, and another exception to which I call your attention:

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extension thereof—

In other words, under this provision the Standard Oil Co. could have, as it has had in the past, as many subsidiary companies scattered around the country as it likes or may find convenient—

Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not to substantially lessen competition.

The word "substantially" is again injected into the bill, and the section contains this unique condition at the end of it in italics on page 9:

Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal.

This seems to be aimed at curing some of the past transactions. What its effect may be in that direction I am unable to tell.

We now come to section 8, which relates to interlocking directors of banks. That provision of the House bill in reference to interlocking directors of banks, State and Federal, was eliminated by the Senate, but restored in conference and put into the bill. What I have to say in reference to that is this:

The banks of this country in the present emergency have been doing great and glorious work in protecting the financial integrity of this country. They have done it without any aid from the Reserve Board and without any aid from the new currency law that has been adopted. The only aid they have had is that which has been given them under the Aldrich-Vreeland bill. In the midst of this financial tension and embargo the banks of New York have not only taken care of the obligations of that city and raised the money to meet its maturing obligations, but they have also provided and are now engaged in providing large sums to take care of the gold reserve and protect the depletion of our gold reserve in this country and to meet our obligations abroad. In the face of such good work as the banks of New York have performed and the banks of the other large cities throughout the country have performed, why should we inflict upon them this legislation? Why is it injected into this bill?

Oh, Mr. President, they had an investigation of the "Money Trust" some time ago, carried on under the auspices of a noted New York lawyer. Under his auspices they carried on an investigation, and in order to show some result of that investigation they injected these provisions into this bill.

Mr. President, when the banks are doing their utmost to take care of the financial affairs of this country, doing it without any help from the Federal Reserve Board, doing it without any help from the new currency law, doing it without any other instrumentality than is obtained through the Aldrich-Vreeland law, why should we go on here and hamstring them with this legislation? Why should we manifest such antipathy to the banks of this country? In the face of the fact that this bill deals so gingerly and so tenderly with interlocking directors of supply and construction companies, the appurtenances of the railroad companies, why should we resort to such drastic course against the banks? Why go out of our way to tie a cord around the necks of the great banks of the country while they are struggling against adverse circumstance to maintain our financial integrity?

I am not here to defend them; but let it be said to the credit of the great banks in New York City that in the black list issued by the Secretary of the Treasury—and I am not criticizing it—of banks that have secured Government aid and hold undue reserves there is not a single bank from New York City. That is to their great credit.

In this connection I ask to have an article that I clipped from the Washington Post read by the Secretary, without reading the heading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, September 27.

The two transactions in modern financing by the United States, each of which is without any precedent, constitute for America the most important news of the day, and, from one point of view, of any day in American history. These two transactions will pass into tradition, and there will be enumerated among the remarkable triumphs of finance. There is not the spectacular feature which was associated with the swift and speedily successful cooperation, chiefly by the bankers of New York, whereby the currency panic of 1907 was ended, for there was visible demonstration of the anxiety and the activity and energy of those who were leading that movement. The meetings at Mr. Morgan's office and the all-night sessions in his library, together with the hasty visit of Mr. Frick and Judge Gary to President Roosevelt at Washington, were incidents which were in the eyes of all men, either through report or personal observation.

But the magnitude of the financing which is now under way, the highly artificial and yet sound machinery which was suddenly created to meet the emergency, and the unifying of the banks of the United States, so that to a certain extent they perfected the functions which a central bank, had there been one, would have possessed, together with the unprecedented emergency and world-wide chaos, which, nevertheless, was free from panic, make this most modern undertaking a gigantic achievement of finance.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, here is a short editorial bearing on the same subject which I ask may be read. It is also from the Washington Post.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BITING OFF TOO MUCH.

The fact that previous legislation has not worked in practice according to the schedule laid down in theory does not seem to have discouraged the party in power in tampering with the business of the Nation. The tariff for revenue only had produced a Treasury deficit months before the European war began. In the war emergency the party turned to the much-maligned Aldrich-Vreeland Currency Act, written by Republicans, for relief, although a new currency law had been enacted.

In the dropping of the railroad securities bill there was an indication that the party in power had come to a realization that this was hardly the time for tampering with business. It is now reported, however, that the conference committee which is considering the Clayton bill has adopted certain provisions which the business world had believed were in the discard.

One of these injurious provisions is designed to provide a criminal penalty to prevent interlocking directorates. Hundreds of national banks are working under joint management with trust companies and savings institutions for the general convenience of their clients, and the result of the interlocking prohibition would be to cause an upheaval in such organizations.

The Clayton bill now strikes more vigorously and deliberately at the heart of business than was expected even when business was not hampered with a great European war. As if the burden of the European financial strain and clogged sea commerce were not enough for business and the banks to carry, Congress would now impose additional hardships.

The new currency law has been accepted pretty generally by the national banks of the country, although they have as yet had no benefits from it. In fact, the only thing accomplished has been the resort to the Republican Aldrich-Vreeland Act. If the operation of the new currency law is to be accompanied by an irksome condition, inflicted by an entirely different law, some of the national banks may be driven out of the new system.

Whatever is to be done now should be carefully considered. This is no time for drastic experiments. The Clayton bill, duplicating and supplementing the Sherman law and adding obnoxious provisions to the patent and currency laws, is filled with pitfalls.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from what paper the editorial is taken?

Mr. NELSON. From the Washington Post.

Mr. CHILTON. The Post, then, seems to be opposed to the bill because it is a little too drastic, as I understand?

Mr. NELSON. The editorial speaks for itself.

Mr. CHILTON. I just wanted to know whether we shall read its news items encouraging opposition to the bill, or its editorials criticizing the bill, in that light.

Mr. NELSON. I will leave that to the Senator's judgment.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not blame the Senator for not undertaking to answer it.

Mr. NELSON. Later on I shall come to something that will be a little more interesting to the Senator from West Virginia.

Section 9 of this bill provides for criminal prosecution of directors. It is a curious incident that on the 17th of July I ventured to introduce and have referred to the Judiciary Committee the following amendment to the Clayton bill, as an additional section to this bill:

That the officers and directors of every corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be jointly and severally liable to the corporation and the stockholders thereof for all losses or damage which may in any manner or degree be entailed upon the corporation or the stockholders thereof through the malfeasance or negligence of such officers or directors; and such losses or damage may be recovered in a suit or civil action by the corporation or by any stockholder thereof on behalf of himself and the other stockholders of the corporation.

Shortly after that amendment was introduced there was injected into this bill the following provision:

SEC. 8. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies or willfully permits to be misapplied any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation arising or accruing from or used in such commerce, in whole or in part, or willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another shall be deemed guilty of a felony—

And so forth.

The amendment I introduced and which I have quoted would furnish an effective remedy for company and stockholders in such cases as that of the New Haven road.

While this bill professes to give relief by criminal procedure against directors and officers, it will be observed that it is exceedingly circumscribed. It relates simply to the embezzlement of funds arising or accruing from or used in such commerce. With that phrase in the bill, it is difficult to see what it can cover except what is in common parlance known as the operating income of the railroads.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator want to call for a quorum?

Mr. CHILTON. No, sir; I merely want to call the Senator's attention to the history of that provision. I merely wish to recall the facts to his mind. He will remember that was adopted by the Senate committee without the words which he has mentioned being in it; in other words, "arising or accruing from such commerce."

Mr. NELSON. That was inserted in the Senate.

Mr. CHILTON. It was inserted by the Senate on motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the words "or used in" were inserted in the conference committee upon motion of one of the Senator's colleagues, I believe one of the House members.

Mr. NELSON. I remember that very well.

Mr. CHILTON. I believe the section is perfectly good with those words in it, and that is the way it was when I introduced it in the committee of the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. The section may be good as far as it goes, but it does not reach anything. As a criminal section, it would be utterly useless in a case like the New Haven road. Where the directors and officers have been guilty of stock manipulation, stock watering, or carrying on such proceedings as were carried on in the case of the New Haven road, this criminal provision could not and would not affect them. It is difficult to see what other matters it can cover, except what is commonly known as the operating income of railroads, and even then it would not cover what was derived from local or intrastate traffic. There has been, as far as I know, little complaint of the embezzlement by directors and officers of the funds and revenues derived by railroad companies from the transportation business. There are very few such cases; I can not at this moment recall any. Where the officers and directors have committed a wrong against the corporation, it has been of a different character; it has been of a character not resulting from the commerce or traffic but from outside manipulation. While this section professes to be a criminal section, and to impose a criminal liability, yet the scope of it is so limited and the effect of it is so circumscribed that it is simply the smallest kind of a homeopathic remedy that you can well imagine.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Lane	Overman	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Lea, Tenn.	Owen	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Lee, Md.	Page	Smith, Mich.
Bristow	Lewis	Perkins	Smoot
Bryan	Lippitt	Pittman	Sterling
Chamberlain	McLean	Pomerene	Thompson
Chilton	Martine, N. J.	Ransdell	Thornton
Clapp	Nelson	Reed	Vardaman
Culberson	Norris	Shafroth	Walsh
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Sheppard	Warren
Hitchcock	Oliver	Shively	Weeks

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. KERN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. STONE, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. WEST, and Mr. WHITE answered to their names when called.

Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is absent on official business.

Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. SWANSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I now come to the greatest transfiguration that has occurred in this bill, and that is section 9. I may say that one of the evils railroad companies have been suffering from for years has been the fact that their officers and directors have organized and maintained what you might call supply companies—companies that are manufacturing machinery, equipments, and other things for the use of the railroad, and doing construction work for them—and in order that it might prove mutually profitable generally the leading officers and managers and the leading manipulators of the railroad companies were connected with these companies, which I, for short, shall call supply companies, furnishing supplies to the railroad companies. In every case where supplies were bought from these concerns the buyer and the seller were the same. These men bought from themselves and exercised their own sweet will in reference to these matters.

To remedy this evil, to cure it—and it was a great evil, as we all know from the history of the past—the House bill contained this provision in section 9. I call your attention to page 10 of the print that contains the three bills in parallel columns. Here is the way it reads and as it passed the House:

SEC. 9. That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person who is engaged as an individual, or who is a member of a partnership, or is a director or other officer of a corporation that is engaged in the business, in whole or in part, of producing or selling equipment, materials, or supplies to, or in the construction or maintenance of, railroads or other common carriers engaged in commerce, shall act as a director or other officer or employee of any other corporation or common carrier engaged in commerce to which he, or such partnership or corporation, sells or leases, directly or indirectly, equipment, materials, or supplies, or for which he or such partnership or corporation, directly or indirectly, engages in the work of construction or maintenance; and after the expiration of said period no person who is engaged as an individual or who is a member of a partnership or is a director or other officer of a corporation which is engaged in the conduct of a bank or trust company shall act as a director or other officer or employee of any such common carrier for which he or such partnership or bank or trust company acts, either separately or in connection with others, as agent for or underwriter of the sale or disposal by such common carrier of issues or parts of issues of its securities—

And so forth.

That provision in the House bill was a good and effective provision. It reached out to cure the evil which had existed of having interlocking directors, officers, and managers between these supply and construction companies and the railroad companies. If there was any case where it was of importance and a vital matter to prevent interlocking directorates, it certainly was in a case of this kind. But what has transpired? In the place of this provision there is a diluted provision which it is most difficult in all its parts to fathom and explain. I will read it and you will see what a strange transfiguration there is. The first part of section 9 of the House bill I have just read, and when I read this you will see what a strange transfiguration the section has undergone.

SEC. 10. That after two years from the approval of this act no common carrier engaged in commerce shall have any dealings in securities, supplies, or other articles of commerce, or shall make or have any contracts for construction or maintenance of any kind, to the amount of more than $50,000 in the aggregate, in any one year, with another corporation, firm, partnership, or association when the said common carrier shall have upon its board of directors or as its president, manager, or as its purchasing or selling officer or agent in the particular transaction, any person who is at the same time a director, manager, or purchasing or selling officer of, or who has any substantial interest in, such other corporation, firm, partnership, or association, unless—unless and except such purchases shall be made from, or such dealings shall be with, the bidder whose bid is the most favorable to such common carrier—

I will not take up the time with reading it, but ask to have the balance of the section as adopted by the conferees inserted in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

The remainder of the section is as follows:

to be ascertained by competitive bidding under regulations to be prescribed by rule or otherwise by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No bid shall be received unless the name and address of the bidder or the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof, if the bidder be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, be given with the bid.

Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, do or attempt to do anything to prevent anyone from bidding or shall do any act to prevent free and fair competition among the bidders or those desiring to bid shall be punished as prescribed in this section in the case of an officer or director.

Every such common carrier having any such transactions or making any such purchases shall within 30 days after making the same file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a full and detailed statement of the transaction showing the manner of the competitive bidding, who were the bidders, and the names and addresses of the directors and officers of the corporations and the members of the firm or partnership bidding; and whenever the said commission shall, after investigation or hearing, have reason to believe that the law has been violated in and about the said purchases or transactions it shall transmit all papers and documents and its own views or findings regarding the transaction to the Attorney General.

If any common carrier shall violate this section it shall be fined not exceeding $25,000; and every such director, agent, manager, or officer thereof who shall have knowingly voted for or directed the act constituting such violation, or who shall have aided or abetted in such violation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not exceeding $5,000, or confined in jail not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. NELSON. It simply provides in substance, in lieu of the paragraph of section 9 of the House bill, which I have quoted, that in these cases the railroad company can buy to the extent of $50,000 in the course of a year from anyone it pleases, without competitive bidding, and that beyond that it must be done by competitive bidding. Now, it sounds very plausible and nice that it must be done through competitive bidding, but it is an old saying of my native land—I will have to render it in English; and it may seem rather crude—that "One crow does not pick out the eyes of another crow." So in this case where a railroad company has an attendant or appurtenant supply or construction company from which it draws its supplies and equipment, although it may go through the form of competitive bidding, yet that attendant or appurtenant company will get the bids, because no other supply company of another railroad corporation would want to interfere—one crow would not pick out the eyes of another crow.

There is another unique matter, too, in connection with it, in regard to any violation of this milk-and-water provision, for I can not call it anything else. It is a provision that in practice is easily evaded. It is a provision about which, as a matter of fact, there is little you can do, because, ex industria, after there has been investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission under this unique substitute all the Interstate Commerce Commission shall do is to report it to the Attorney General.

We have included section 2, section 4, section 7, and section 8 in what I call the procedure provision of section 11; in other words, where the court can investigate and issue its order to stop it, and where, if it is not stopped, they can go before the court and get an order of injunction to carry it out. Not only that, but, ex industria, it has been excluded from another provision of the bill—section 16. Section 16 is a most meritorious section, which gives for the first time the right of a private litigant to go into a court of justice and get injunctive relief under the antitrust laws, a remedy he never had before, and which embraces in its provisions sections 2, 3, 7, and 8; but section 10 is omitted. This is excluded from the provisions of section 11, and it is also excluded from the provisions of section 16. It is left in the air, to the tender mercies of the Department of Justice to move or not as they see fit.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NELSON. I will in a moment. How much care has been taken to protect these poor supply companies that are furnishing equipment and carrying on construction for these railroad companies, against the inroads of the Trade Commission, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to prevent them from going into court and getting injunctive relief when everybody else can get it? It passes my understanding. But I can see very well that men may feel tender in such cases, and I am not here to question their motives. Only it looks to me like a case of extreme tenderness.

I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator has either been unfortunate in his statement or else he has not carefully read the section which he is discussing. It would be impossible for him to apply his crow story to the section if he will give the proper meaning to all the words of the section. It not only prevents corporations which are interlocked by officers and directors, but it says:

Or who has any substantial interest in such of them.

The Senator will recall all we had before us, the ease by which interlocking directorates could be gotten around; in other words, you could have your son, or your cousin, or your lawyer, or your agent upon the corporation and accomplish the same thing as if you were on the board yourself.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question before he proceeds further? If this remedy is good in these cases of interlocking directorates between a supply company and the railroad company, if it is a valuable paregoric, why in the world did you not apply the same principle in the case of banks and other companies to interlocking directorates? Why make these supply companies the favorites?

Mr. CHILTON. It is general, and it meets the very thing that it was intended to meet; that is, a case where the members of a railroad company or of a common carrier will go out and buy its own securities and then sell them to the banks, or where they have interlocking directors or an interlocking interest between the railroad and the bank, they buy securities, say, at 60, and then sell them to the trust company or to the life insurance company for 85 or 90. This prevents that. It was to meet that particular situation. They can not dodge it by having a supply company, and even though they have discarded the form of interlocking directors, if there be the interest of the railroad or the common carrier in the supply company, as the Senator chooses to call it, then it is prohibited.

Mr. President, it is made a crime simply as larceny is made a crime, as selling whisky is made a crime, as conspiracy is made a crime, and it can be met by the Attorney General. There is no need to send this to the Trade Commission, though I would not object to it, because when the Trade Commission would get it the transaction would be over. It is one transaction. The directors are selling, say, a million dollars' worth of bonds for themselves at less than they are worth, and if they do it without having competition as prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission it is made a crime. Then the transaction is over. There is nothing to go to the Trade Commission with. It is just as if a man sells whisky. When he sells it it is a crime, and there is no use to go and lock the stable after the horse is out.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be a good plan to enjoin them from doing it in the future?

Mr. CHILTON. But they are enjoined by a specific statute. Each act is an offense.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is a good lawyer, but I think you would find it exceedingly difficult to draw an indictment under the provisions of that section.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not think there would be a particle of difficulty.

Mr. NELSON. Let me ask the Senator a question as to section 16, where you give injunctive relief to private individuals. Suppose the officers of a railroad company find out that some of their directors are about to violate this law, that they are about to proceed to get these supplies contrary to the provisions of the law, can the Senator tell me why they should not have the same opportunity as other litigants to go into a court of justice and get an injunction? Why do you except them from the provisions of section 16?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me answer that, I will say they are not excepted. You could enjoin them. If you discovered that any officer or director of a corporation was about to engage in a conspiracy not only to violate a law of the United States, but to violate a fundamental principle of morality, and to violate the common law of every State in this Union, anybody interested could enjoin him from doing it. But let me ask the Senator, where an offense consists of a single act, which, when done, completes the offense, and the doing of it does the injury both private and public, would the Senator favor the issuance of an injunction in such a case? Why not enjoin from selling whisky contrary to law? Why not have an injunction to prevent a man from committing forgery of the paper of the United States? The Senator is certainly not logical in his argument. There is no restriction here against injunction at all.

Mr. NELSON. I call attention——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the Senator's permission and in further answer, I call his attention to the language of section 16, which is as follows:

SEC. 16. That any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws.

This law is by express provision of section 1 made one of the antitrust laws referred to.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; but why do you enumerate? The bill reads, "including sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act." Why do you not include section 10 in the enumeration?

Mr. CULBERSON. We include sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 because their enforcement is given to these commissions; and we wanted to make this remedy clearly cumulative and not exclusive.

Mr. NELSON. You have excluded them from the procedure. I call the Senator's attention to section 11, which is found on page 15. It is as follows:

SEC. 11. That authority to enforce compliance with sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act by the persons respectively subject thereto is hereby vested: in the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers, in the Federal Reserve Board where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies, and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce.

Now, the first paragraph of section 9 is eliminated, and its substitute section 10 is not included either in the procedure provision of section 11 or in section 16, giving injunctive relief.

Section 12 of the bill relates simply to the question of venue and the service of process. Section 13 relates to the subpœnaing of witnesses. Section 14 relates to the liability of officers found guilty of violating the antitrust law.

I will now call your attention to how in this section the conferees have diluted and weakened this provision:

Whenever a corporation shall violate any of the penal provisions.

Recollect that the offense is limited to a violation of the penal provisions, and that excludes section 7 of the antitrust law, which gives private relief in triple damages.

SEC. 14. That whenever a corporation shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, such violation shall be deemed to be also that of the individual directors, officers, or agents of such corporation who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts constituting in whole or in part such violation.

I call your attention to the words "who shall have authorized, ordered, or done any of the acts." See how that limits the scope of the provision. There must be either an order or an authorization or an act committed. In the Criminal Code we have language which covers this in a more comprehensive and searching manner, as follows:

SEC. 332. Whoever directly commits any act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids—

Now, listen to the language—or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is a principal.

That is perfectly plain language. We put that same provision in the Senate bill, the language of which reads:

That every director, officer, or agent of a corporation which shall violate any of the penal provisions of the antitrust laws, who shall have aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, or procured such violation, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

There we had the most comprehensive and drastic language—the very language of the Criminal Code—while the language found in the conference report limits the offense, so that in many cases officers and directors, if they are careful not to come out in the open and give an order, not to come out in the open and authorize the act to be done, not to come out in the open and do the act themselves, will be immune and can not be punished. Under the drastic language of the Criminal Code nothing further was needed in this direction than that section of the code. They would be liable if they abetted, if they counseled, if they consented, if they induced, or if they procured in any manner such violation. Senators can see how the change of language dilutes and diminishes the force and effect of the entire provision. The provision of the Criminal Code is ample to cover the offenses of officers and directors in such cases, and hence there was no need for such a section as section 14, and if the section remains in the bill it ought to have the scope and vigor of the Criminal Code, and not be weakened and diluted as it is in the bill.

As I said a moment ago, how easy it would be to evade this language. If you can not show that a man gave an order, if you can not show that he authorized the act, if he did not do the act himself, he is not liable; yet he may have sat back in a corner and whispered to other men, urged them quietly and secretly to do this act, and through other instrumentalities, through mere dummies, he may have had the act ordered, he may have had it authorized; and yet this man who sits back, who inspires the act and brings these things to pass, the father of all the evil, is immune under this provision. It is difficult to see why the conference committee did not adopt the language of the Senate bill, which was in exact conformity with the criminal code which I have quoted. It seems there was a deliberate purpose to dilute and weaken the bill in order to leave an opening of escape for the directors and officers of corporations who violate its provisions.

Section 15 of the bill is simply a reenactment of sections 4 and 5 of the antitrust law—nothing more and nothing less.

Section 16 gives, for the first time, injunctive relief under the antitrust laws to private individuals, but it is somewhat limited in scope, and there are but a limited number of cases which can come under it. I can not conceive many cases, except cases involving the rights that might be enforced under section 7 of the antitrust law. It is only in those cases where it is available; and if you will read the section, you will see that its scope is but limited:

SEC. 16. That any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties, against threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws.

In other words, there may be a trust and there may be a monopoly existing, and the complainant is obliged to show not only that there is such a trust and such a monopoly, but he has to show that he is threatened with irreparable special damage. Unless he can make it appear that he is threatened with such damage, he will not be entitled to injunctive relief.

As I said a moment ago, the provisions of sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act are included in section 16, while the provisions of section 10 are entirely omitted. That seems to be the favored class of corporations. Banks are included under section 11; holding companies are included under it; industrial corporations are included under it; everything is included under the provisions of the proposed law, except the companies that furnish supplies to do construction work for the railroad companies. We have in the past noticed the great evils that have been perpetrated by these supply construction companies.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Co., as the older Senators well know, was wrecked, passed through a reorganization process, and was reincorporated. Many of the original stockholders sustained great losses, and those losses were entailed by construction companies. The directors and some of the other officers of the company formed construction companies and got the job of building sections of the railroad, of supplying the iron, the ties, and the other material for its construction at exorbitant prices. They made fortunes out of it, while the road itself was wrecked.

Why we should deal in such a gingerly and timid manner with these supply corporations, with this class of business, while we take the others by the throat and hold them up as examples, is a mystery to me.

I now come to section 17 of the bill, which relates in general to the remedy by injunction for the public at large, for everybody except labor organizations. There is some slight change in the section from the new equity rule 73 recently adopted by the United States Supreme Court. The most material change is that the order becomes effective and the time commences to run from the moment the injunction is issued, and not from the time it is served, as is commonly the practice in the courts. In all other judicial proceedings time does not begin to run, as a rule, before the service is complete; but while I think that is a mistake it has been cured by an amendment which allows the court to grant additional time.

Section 18 relates to the giving of security for injunction, and section 19 relates to the form of restraining orders and prescribes what a restraining order or an interlocutory injunction shall set forth, and so on. There is no particular objection to that.

The next section, section 20, relates to injunctions in labor cases; and to this section I desire to briefly call your attention. It provides:

That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States or a judge or the judges thereof in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application.

This part of the section differs from the general injunctive provision of section 17. The language of that section is:

No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party, unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts, shown by affidavit or by the verified bill, that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the applicant.

And so forth.

For the public at large, injunctive relief is obtainable by section 17 when "immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the applicant." This is and has long been existing law. In section 20, relating to injunction in labor disputes, the language is:

Unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application.

When this bill was pending in the Senate, I put the question to the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], as to what the effect of that language in section 20 would be, and he said, as I recall it—and I think he was correct—that it meant nothing at all; that it made no change in the law and did not have a different legal effect from the provisions contained in section 17. Why, then, was this language put in section 20, so different from that in section 17?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The statement made by the Senator is substantially correct, excepting that, in response to his inquiry some weeks since as to what the language meant, I did not say that it meant nothing at all. I, however, expressed the opinion that it did not alter the existing law. The Senator may remember that is what I said.

Mr. NELSON. Perhaps I overstated it; the Senator has stated correctly that he said it did not alter existing law; that is true.

Why was this provision put in? It was put in, to use plain language without circumlocution, as a sop to the laboring men of the country; to make them believe that they have secured an important concession. Their leaders have constantly argued before the committees of this body and elsewhere that the right to labor, that the right to carry on and do business was not a property right; that it was outside the pale of the law; that one was not entitled to relief unless the destruction of some physical property was threatened. Their theory is, Mr. President, that the right to carry on a business or the right to labor is in no wise a property right; in other words, taking their argument and carrying it to its legitimate conclusion, they hold that, while you can have protection against the destruction of the tools, the plant, and the buildings of a manufacturing corporation, if an injury is threatened to those physical properties, you are entitled to protection by injunctive relief, but if an effort is made simply to break up and entirely destroy a business, that that is not property and is not subject to injunctive relief; or if laboring men are prevented from going to work, if they are excluded from the opportunity of earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, that they are not entitled to relief. My opinion is—and it coincides with that of the Senator from New York—that although the conferees have incorporated these words as a sop, as I said a moment ago, to the laboring men, yet it does not change the effect of the law in the least. In other words, while they have been crying for bread in this respect it is practically giving them a mere stone.

The section goes on further to provide:

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment.

That is the law now and it always has been the law, so far as I know. There have been one or two instances, perhaps, where the courts have taken a different view; but, as an entirety, the courts of the country have always held that laboring men had a right to quit their work, either singly or in concert. There may be cases where it would not apply, perhaps. Suppose, for instance, that a train of cars is stopped on a track between stations; the road is a single-track road; other trains are about to come from either direction, and there is a likelihood of a collision happening. I do not think that the crew of that train, stopped in that condition, would be warranted or justified in quitting the train for the time being. That would be practically committing a most serious offense.

Then there is a picketing provision in the bill and a provision recognizing the primary and secondary boycott. I desire to say that I think the courts have always justified, so far as I know, what I call peaceable picketing—that is, the kind of picketing where men on strike communicate in a peaceful manner with so-called strike breakers, advise them why they, the strikers, have quit their employment, explain to them what has been the trouble, and urge the strike breakers to quit also. There never has been an inhibition against that practice. But when they proceed to the extreme of going in large bodies and interrupting the business or operations of a factory or a plant, or where they assemble in large bodies in front of the residence of an employee, although they may be quiet, although they may not resort to any threats, although they may not resort to any physical violence, yet if they appear there in a body, there may be cases where such action amounts to intimidation. If you study the history of strikes in our country, you will find that the most baneful thing, the thing that leads to riot and bloodshed and trouble, comes from picketing.

While this provision in the bill is in a mild form—and I do not think that it authorizes what I call illegal or unlawful picketing—and while I do not think it justifies violence, yet I think it is put into this bill for the purpose of giving the laboring men a reason to believe that they get a broader permission, a greater authority, than they have ever heretofore had under the law. I do not think that this provision, construed in its proper light, is open to that interpretation, and I believe that it will prove misleading to laboring men—may, under bad leaders, encourage them to go to extremes.

Now I come to the next provision, the boycott provision. In my opinion that provision includes both the primary and secondary boycott. There are only two classes of cases, so far as I know, where the Supreme Court has passed upon this question. One was a case against laboring men; the other against retail lumber dealers. The former was in what is known as the Danbury Hatters' case, where by a secondary boycott the workers broke up the industry of a manufacturer of hats in Danbury, Conn. The other was known as the Retail Lumber Dealers' case, recently decided by the Supreme Court, in which retail lumber dealers throughout the country undertook to boycott every manufacturer and wholesale dealer who sold direct to consumers in towns where these dealers were located. The Supreme Court applied the same rule that it did in the Danbury Hatters' case and held that, notwithstanding the retail lumber dealers moved with circumlocution and in careful and in a studied manner by circulars and letters, it was nevertheless in fact a boycott, and the court enjoined it and prohibited the continuance of it.

Sections 21, 22, 23, and 24 relate to the remedy for contempt, and here is another matter as to which I want to explain how the laboring men will feel themselves disappointed. While sections 21, 22, and 23 provide for the trial of contempt cases for violation of an injunction by a jury in all cases where the violation of the injunction is a criminal offense—and most of such violations are criminal offenses—yet in the case of the Federal Government under section 24 that rule does not apply. Section 24 reads as follows:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of, or on behalf of, the United States, but the same, and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 21 of this act, may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing.

In other words, in every case brought by the Government—and most of the cases that are brought under the antitrust law are brought by the Government, for it is only actions under section 7 of the antitrust law and section 16 of this law that individuals can sue—the same rule prevails and continues with regard to contempt of injunction orders that has heretofore prevailed. That is to say, violations of injunction orders or contempts of court are triable by the courts and not by a jury.

Most of us here are old enough to remember the noted railroad strike in Chicago in 1904. The employees of the Pullman Co. were in a labor dispute with that company. They were unable to settle it. Mr. Debs and other leaders of labor organizations hit upon the plan of establishing what they called a sympathetic strike throughout the entire country—in other words, to place an embargo on the hauling of Pullman cars on all the railroads of the country, to prohibit every railroad throughout the country from hauling those cars, and threatening to strike and suspend work on every train that hauled a Pullman car. That led to great violence in Chicago—violence on the part of the labor leaders and their followers, violence on the part of an outside mob that sympathized with them, the destruction of railroad cars, the burning of cars, the wrecking of trains, the tearing up of tracks, and all that, with a suspension of railroad traffic to and from that city. The governor of Illinois at that time, Mr. Altgeld, said to be a Socialist, did not try to do anything to intervene and stop that calamity. Finally President Cleveland ordered United States troops there to preserve peace and restore order——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Wait until I get through with my statement. In the meantime, however, application was made on behalf of the Federal Government to the United States court for an injunction order, and an injunction was granted and served on Mr. Debs and his followers, and the effect of that injunction was that it stopped and broke up that sympathetic strike.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me to make a correction?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure the Senator from Minnesota did not mean a reflection upon the memory of the late John P. Altgeld; but I will assure him, from the history of that distinguished man, that the suggestion that he was a Socialist does great injustice to him.

While I was not able to agree with Gov. Altgeld, in the days of his administration, on many matters for which he stood in their details, I do not hesitate to say that a better Democrat, a sincerer Democrat, a purer and more zealous Democrat, has never honored the ranks of the Democracy of America. He was a Democrat, and not a Socialist. His objection to the Federal troops being sent into Illinois by President Cleveland was not upon any ground of social view, but, I will say to the able Senator from Minnesota, upon the ground which existed in those days, and which found expression upon the part of very eminent scholars of government, to wit, that the Federal Government should never send Federal troops into a State without the demand of the executive of the State.

I invite my able friend from Minnesota to remember that that was Gen. Palmer's position, when he was governor of Illinois, as against the President at a time preceding Gov. Altgeld's administration, and was the exact position of a distinguished Republican governor under similar conditions in another State of the Union, upon the theory, right or wrong—the able Senator and myself will not now discuss that question—that the Federal Government has no right to interfere in the sovereign matters of a State without the consent of its people, nor to send Federal troops into any State until the executive shall first have announced his inability to maintain order by the local constabulary. That was the theory upon which Gov. Altgeld acted, I may say to the able Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I am quite familiar with that matter. Whether Mr. Altgeld was a Socialist or not I will not undertake to say. If it suits the Senator, I will withdraw that remark. It was the common understanding, outside of Mr. Altgeld's environment in Chicago, that he belonged to that class. Whether he did or not, it is sufficient to say that he made no effort to stop that violence and lawlessness. President Cleveland acted on the theory that he had the right, and it was his duty, as President of the United States, to protect the transportation of the United States mails and to keep the channels of interstate commerce free and open.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. He acted on that ground; and the Supreme Court in its decision in the Debs case put it on the same ground, and not on the ground of antitrust law, as the lower court had done, although the Supreme Court said that the decision of the lower court was on good ground, yet the Supreme Court preferred to put it on the higher and broader ground that it was justified for the protection of the operations of the United States Government in carrying the mails of the country and keeping open the arteries of commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I am not here to criticize those men of the past, and I am not referring to it for that purpose, Mr. President. I simply refer to these historical events as a prelude to what I am now about to state.

The Federal Government instituted a suit in the United States court to stop that strike. An injunction was applied for, an injunction was issued, and that broke up the trouble. Mr. Debs undertook to violate that injunction, and he was adjudged guilty of contempt by the court. In his statement—and it is found in tl report of the court—he stated that that injunction was the only thing that disturbed him—that stopped the strike and that that was more fatal than the troops. After the injunction was served it broke up the lawlessness and the strike was at an end.

I have called attention to these matters for this reason: After the trial of Debs for contempt we heard the hue and cry throughout the country of "government by injunction." "What a horrid thing to think of that the United States was seeking to rule by injunction—was seeking to keep the arteries of commerce open by means of the writ of injunction." Ever since that time there has been some agitation in labor circles to deprive the court of this power. They want to get relief from that. They do not want government by injunction, such as there was in the Debs case. It has been an eyesore to them. But what do they get in this case? Do they get any relief in that direction?

The Debs case was a case on the part of the United States. If the provisions of section 24 as they are now had been in force at that time, it would not have changed the situation. This bill in section 24, does not change the existing law in the matter of contempts where the United States is a party. It is only in suits of private parties; and those are very few and far between under the antitrust laws.

Does it not strike you, Senators, as a little unfair that by section 16 of this bill you have for the first time given private individuals the right to go into court and get injunctive relief as the Federal Government can get it, and then, after having given private individuals this remedy by injunction, you deprive them of part of the remedies that the Federal Government has in a suit instituted by it?

In the first place, that is a grave discrimination between the Government and the private litigant. In the next place, it amounts to very little in behalf of the laboring man, because the suits that will be brought by private litigants will be exceedingly limited.

So, Mr. President, when you study this bill from first to last, you will find that when it comes to these trusts, monopolies, and combinations the bill deals with them in a most gingerly and harmless manner. It administers legislative relief in homeopathic doses of the very slightest and feeblest kind. This is true as to labor organizations also.

They imagine that they get a good deal out of the phrase in section 6, declaring that labor is not an article of commerce. They imagine that they get a good deal of relief out of the section which prescribes that no injunctive relief shall be permitted, except it involves property or property rights. They imagine that they get immense relief from the requirement that in a few limited cases contempts shall be tried by a jury. When you sum it all up, however, they get almost as little out of this bill as the public at large gets out of the remedial sections of the bill in respect to trusts, monopolies, and unjust combinations.

Mr. President, I want to say, in conclusion, that I am not hostile to the laboring men. The first 20 years of my life were a struggle with abject poverty. My sympathies and my heart are with them. I have no hostility to laboring men; but if I were to-day toiling as a laboring man, as I did during the first 20 years of my life, I would say, "Measure out the same law and the same gospel to me that you do to other classes of the community." I should feel humiliated, as a laboring man, if I asked any special favors, different from other people of the community.

I want to say, Mr. President, that the rank and file of the laboring men I have talked with, and especially the railroad men in my country—and they are a high grade of men—do not ask any special favors. I have not had a letter or a communication from any railroad organization in the State of Minnesota—and we have some of the great transcontinental lines there—asking for this particular legislation. None of the farmers have invoked it. There are certain petty labor organizations in the cities—a few small organizations like those of cigar dealers and so on—that have written me letters, but the great aggregations of laboring men, the men who do the transportation business of this country, the men who do the great work of this country in the industrial fields, are actuated by no desire and no purpose to get any other permission than anybody else to violate the laws of this country. In my experience, and I have had much of it, I have always found that in the long run you could talk to these laboring men and reason with them, and you would find them just and fair and law-abiding, asking no favors beyond their fellows in the community.

That is my experience; and I have always found, in conferring with laboring men, that they are ready to obey the laws of our country without fear or favor, and to respect the flag and the authority of our Government.

Mr. President, I have taken up more of the time of the Senate than I intended to take, but I felt that I must review the provisions of this conference bill. What the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has so well said is impressed upon my mind. This bill as it emerges from the conference committee indicates truly a retiring from the program that was announced at the beginning of this administration.

It was announced that we should supplement the antitrust law, fortify it, make it more drastic and more effective. This bill as it emerged from conference is anything but drastic and anything but effective.

In this connection I will call the attention of the Senate—and with that I will cease to occupy the attention of the Senate—to a part of a letter of Mr. Henry Clews, of New York, a banker who issues weekly letters about the financial condition of the country. What I quote from this letter will attest the truth of what the Senator from Missouri has stated in much more eloquent terms than I can use. Here is what Mr. Clews observes:

We have already referred—

This is in his letter of September 26—

We have already referred to the improved political outlook at Washington. The administration is decidedly more friendly to big business and there is less disposition to unduly harass great business concerns, which already have problems enough on hand. It is also rumored that the Government will drop the proposal for entering into the shipping business—a project that was unnecessary, and would surely have meant an increased burden upon the taxpayers without any corresponding benefit to the public at large. A great deal of opposition is developing against new measures of taxation. The majority are feeling hard times. They are in no mood to consider increased taxes, which in the end the consumer invariably pays—

And so forth.

So, Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say that while this bill was launched with a great blare of trumpets as a measure that was calculated to fortify the antitrust law, to give greater and more comprehensive remedies against trusts, and to give ampler latitude to labor organizations, yet in all of these respects it is diluted and emasculated and an utter failure as a remedial measure. As a strengthening of the antitrust law it is an abject failure; and in respect to the legislation asked for by labor organizations, it is to a large extent a failure, and fails to give them what they looked for and expected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a noted southern lawyer, in an address sometime ago, used this language:

Great aggregations of capital have been formed which h[illegible] seized upon specific industries and driven everybody else out of t[illegible] They stand like armed colossi astride the gateways of commerce a[illegible] stroy every entrant who presumes to compete with them. They have no legal grant or monopoly, but monopoly comes to them by virtue of their size, organization, and strength, just as surely as monopoly went to the East India Co. by royal grant.

In an address made by our esteemed and honored President before he was inaugurated he said:

I believe, as I believe in nothing else, in the average integrity and the average intelligence of the American people, and I do not believe that the intelligence of America can be put into commission anywhere. I do not believe that there is any group of men of any kind to whom we can afford to give that kind of trusteeship.

I will not live under trustees if I can help it. No group of men less than the majority has a right to tell me how I have got to live in America. I will submit to the majority, because I have been trained to do it—though I may sometimes have my private opinion even of the majority. I do not care how wise, how patriotic the trustees may be, I have never heard of any group of men in whose hands I am willing to lodge the liberties of America in trust.

Again, in a later address, he says:

Everything I know about history, every bit of experience and observation that has contributed to my thought, has confirmed me in the conviction that the real wisdom of human life is compounded out of the experiences of ordinary men.

In an article published in the Atlantic Monthly in 1901 the same distinguished author says:

It is no longer possible to mistake the reaction against democracy. The nineteenth century was, above all others, a century of democracy, and yet the world is no more convinced of the benefits of democracy as a form of government at its end than it was at its beginning.

Mr. President, these quotations contain a statement of facts, the announcement of a principle, and the suggestion of a situation interesting if not serious with reference to our institutions. I indorse the fact, I am in thorough harmony with the principle, and I think the suggestion well worthy of reflection.

There are cross currents apparently running in American affairs and in those matters which deal particularly and directly with the interests of the citizen—cross currents of propaganda and of action. This is a time when we are advocating popular government, the placing of the Government more completely under the control of the electorate, and transferring its powers more completely to the people. But, as a matter of fact, every act of legislation, not only the immediate legislation with which we are dealing but for years, has had a tendency to withdraw from the people those fundamental powers which so essentially deal with their interests and have so broadly and comprehensively to do with their welfare. While we discuss popular government and profess to be its advocate, we are legislating to place in the hands of a few trustees, of a commission, powers without any limitation as to discretion or without any regard to the great principle inherent in and indispensible to our form of government—the division of powers. We have, as I mentioned in the Senate a few days ago, at this time our transportation interests under the control of a commission, we have our currency under the control of a commission, we are contemplating putting the electric capacity of the country under the control of a commission, we have placed our great industrial affairs under the control of a commission, and we are now advocating the idea of placing our tax-levying power under the control of a commission; thus all the great, fundamental, essential powers of government which deal so directly and vitally with the interests of the masses of the people are being withdrawn and placed in the hands of a few men whom the people can neither elect nor recall. We not only place in the hands of these few men the ordinary reins of government but we clothe them with an unlimited and undefined discretion which amounts to the lodgment of arbitrary power.

So, Mr. President, while the advocacy is being made for popular government and the extension of rights, placing them more completely in the hands of the people, we are quietly by our legislation pursuing the very opposite course.

My objections to this bill, therefore, Mr. President, are fundamental and have very little to do with the particular work which the conference committee performed. I am opposed to the theory upon which the Trade Commission bill was built, and this law is in effect nothing more than an aid to the Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Federal Reserve Board. Whenever we shall have thoroughly analyzed the different provisions of this bill and have worked out to their final conclusion the effect of the different provisions we will arrive at no other conclusion than the fact that this bill is now made to conform entirely to the principle of the Trade Commission act, the Federal reserve act, and the Interstate Commerce Commission law. In fact, I think, with the exception of one or two sections, it might be designated as entirely in aid of and as a supplement to those acts. I feel, therefore, perfectly justified in discussing this measure from a somewhat broader view and upon a wider basis, I may say, than a mere objection to the action of the conference committee.

In fact, Mr. President, it may be said in justification of the report of the conference committee that it is in harmony, and the committee has undoubtedly sought to bring the bill into harmony, with the general trend of legislation. While I might, were I in favor of this kind of legislation, find some reason for discussing the details of the report, infinitely more important to me is the other question, whether we are prepared at this time to give our final approval to an entire change of policy with reference to dealing with these matters, concerning which we deal under the Trade Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal reserve act, and this bill.

In other words, Mr. President, this is another step indicating a complete change of policy upon the part of the Government with reference to dealing with monopolies and trusts. It is a confirmation of steps which have heretofore been taken along that line and, indeed, must be considered as in a measure a final approval of the change of policy.

The fact, Mr. President, that the Sherman law remains upon the statute books does not at all mollify my opposition to this law; neither does it, in my judgment, change the fact that we are changing our policy with reference to it, because it is not a question of the Sherman law remaining upon the statute books, but the question is, Are we preparing to abandon the enforcement of the Sherman law and to ignore that method and manner of dealing with monopolies and trusts, and are we preparing to take up another method which must be in its practical workings in contravention to the theory which is embodied in the Sherman law? Are we substituting a method of dealing with monopoly, which substituted method will strengthen the argument of those who disbelieve in the Sherman law and the principle upon which it was founded?

In view of the difficulty which we have had in past years in securing the enforcement of the Sherman law, in view of the tremendous pressure against its enforcement in certain quarters, and in view of the fact, as we know, that the propaganda is constantly going forward to the effect that it is in contravention to the best interests of the business of this country that it be enforced, and that it should be repealed, can we doubt that when another method is at hand, notwithstanding the Sherman law remains upon the statute books, the other method will be adopted, and in a very few months, or a very few years at most, and instead of undertaking to destroy monopoly and to end its existence in the industrial field we will content ourselves with an attempt to regulate it, to somewhat modify its extortions, and to somewhat control its demands upon the American public? It is my fear of this result, my settled conviction that this is to be its final effect, that leads me to impose upon myself the task of speaking somewhat at length to a tired and listless Senate. I shall, I know, change no vote. I shall not be able to arrest the passage of this measure, but I shall keep the record straight, and possibly at a later period arrest the attention of those to whom all final appeals should be made under our form of government; that is, our present form of government.

I think that the supporters of the bill will agree with me, that it establishes two things pretty conclusively. First, that it is in support and in aid of the trade-commission principle, to wit, the regulation of monopolies, because that is what it will result in, and, secondly, that the enforcement of the criminal law with regard to trusts is undesirable if not ineffective. Both of these propositions are in clear contravention to the whole theory and every principle of the Sherman law.

We have not only brought some of these sections to expressly provide that they shall be enforced by the Trade Commission, but we have specifically provided that where that is true there shall be no punishment of the offenders. In other words, we are up against the proposition already which it seemed to me clear from the beginning we would have to meet, and that is that in just so far as is extended the principle of the Trade Commission act, which is the beginning of regulation and control, we must recede from the other proposition of the destruction of monopolies and the punishment as offenders of those who create monopolies. This bill not only clearly discloses by reason of those sections which bring it under the enforcement of the Trade Commission act but by reason of the rejection of penal sections that we are prepared even so soon to go the full distance of announcing to the country that the rigors of the Sherman antitrust law are to be mollified and the enforcement of any criminal statute or the enactment of any criminal statute to deal with monopolistic practices is, in the judgment of this body and of Congress, unwise. We give the weight of our judgment in a clear and conclusive way that monopoly and monopolistic practices are both tolerable and defensible and may be successfully regulated.

There will be but one interpretation placed upon these acts, and justly so, when they are thoroughly understood, and that is that the Congress of the United States has in its wisdom determined that the course which has been heretofore pursued has been a failure; that the ultimate success for which we hoped can not be realized; and that, slowly, it is true, but step by step, we are changing the policy and are undertaking to regulate and control these vast monopolies and combines instead of destroying them.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to concede to some of those who take that view the same integrity of purpose, the same patriotism which those who are opposed to it claim for themselves. They may be right. It may be that we shall be driven to that course. It may be that that is the only successful way, or if not the only successful way, the only partially successful way in which we can deal with these questions. But speaking for myself, I am not ready to adopt the policy. I am not willing to concede the proposition. I am so firmly convinced that in the present condition of the Sherman law as interpreted by the Supreme Court it can be successfully enforced, and I am so firmly convinced that its successful enforcement will be to the ultimate good of the people of this country, yea, more necessary for the ultimate preservation of the Republican institutions of this country, that I can not bring myself to yield in the first struggle for this new policy. I look upon the very existence of these monopolies, these vast and powerful combines, as so fraught with evil, so destructive of every theory and principle upon which a republic is built that I must oppose to the last any policy which would tolerate them.

It will be understood, therefore, Mr. President, that I am not undertaking to criticize as to details the report of the conference committee. I want to discuss it upon a different ground. I want to see legitimate business protected and I want to see it prosper. I want to legislate upon the theory that 98 per cent of our business men are honest and conduct their business upon and along honorable lines. I want to hold to the wise and most salutary rule wrought out by human experience that, except in most urgent and in most exceptional instances, men should be left free to work out through their own initiative and self-help their own salvation and that bureaucracy is as blighting to the energies of free men as the August frost to the husbandman's hopes. But I do not want to see either now or hereafter any compromise with illegitimate business or dishonest methods through and by means of which great monopolies are built up. I want the same kind of punishment administered to theft, however it may be committed. Upon these lines I want to see legislation framed.

This change of policy has not come around suddenly. It is not the result of lack of thought or consideration. I frankly concede that there has been a vast amount of discussion and a great deal of consideration given to it. It had its real beginning with the announcement of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and the Tobacco cases. It is true that prior to that time there were sporadic instances of people advocating that theory, but a well-organized propaganda for the doing away with the Sherman law, the adopting of a different course, creating a commission at Washington to deal with these questions and to regulate them and not destroy them, the impossibility of enforcing the Sherman law through the criminal processes of the courts—these views were thoroughly presented for the first time immediately following the decisions in those cases.

Senators who listen to me will recall that immediately after the rendition of the decision in the Tobacco case and the Standard Oil case there were a number of articles published in a number of newspapers of the United States, over the signatures of some of the most prominent men in the country, discussing, in view of those decisions of the court, what should be our future policy. It would be interesting to all who are interested in the question, and it has been interesting to me, to go back and reread those articles, because in this bill are found the embodiment, to a very large extent, of the policies which were announced by some of those writers who thought that the Sherman law was an impossible law for business.

I am not going to take much of the time of the Senate to read them; but I call attention to some of the passages. I shall not, when I read these quotations, give the names of the parties, principally for the reason that I think it unnecessary to refer to individuals in the discussion of this matter and to attack men's view in a personal way who are not in a position to defend them; but I am entitled to call attention to these views and to say this much, that those from whom I read are those who have been connected with the organizing of large combines and trusts of this country, either as counsel or as business participants in their organization. In one of the articles published in the New York Times it is said:

> But aside from this intolerable doubt as to financial consequences, there is the anxiety growing out of the uncertainty of an attempted enforcement of the criminal provision of the act, which subjects offenders, if found guilty, to the possibility (if that section of the law be upheld) of a year's imprisonment for every separate offense.
> The officers of interstate corporations are in constant jeopardy of a sudden criminal attack. There is no fixed standard by which they can govern their conduct. The industrial world is at the mercy of Secret Service men and the Department of Justice.

And the writer concludes his article by saying:

> Let the Government, instead of fettering or shackling the tremendous and limitless resources, energy, and strength of our industrial world, turn its fruits into paths of profit and usefulness for all of the people.

Another writer upon this subject, whose article was published in the Chicago Daily Tribune, said:

> The Department of Justice is now bombarded with requests for their opinion upon such questions, because good business men desire to take no risk with the law, and rather than run the risk of prosecution for something they do not regard as criminal are seeking to have the Department of Justice, an association of lawyers, assume the powers of review upon business methods which this tribunal would assume. This situation, in itself, constitutes an argument for this proposed law.

The proposed law which he suggests there was that there should be a method worked out through the Interstate Commerce Commission or some other department in Washington by which a body of business men should be there authorized to advise the other business men what they could properly do and what they could not properly do. The argument was to the effect that only business men could determine what was legitimate and what was moral and what was proper in the business world, and that to undertake to lay down a rule of right conduct rigidly in a statute and say that that should be enforced or if violated the party should be punished was an impossible principle to undertake to intrench in business affairs. So he argued for a commission.

Now, I read from another distinguished business man:

> In my opinion the Sherman antitrust law was based upon unsound theories. It should now be repealed. Under it some 30 or 40 prosecutions have occurred and many corporations or combinations have been broken up.

The writer from whom I quote in this instance is one who has been very prominently connected with the organization of these large industries. He has organized or assisted in organizing a monopoly which has come under the condemnation of the law and so adjudged by the courts. He says:

> Instead of even attempting to enact legislation to regulate and control our great interstate and international agencies of trade—regulation that would eradicate the evils that exist and preserve to the people the good that exists—the legislative branch of our Government shirked and unloaded its responsibility onto the Supreme Court, which was asked to interpret a law passed under ancient commercial conditions in such a way as to fit modern commercial conditions. No more difficult task was ever put up to a body of intelligent men. As a result our Government has set out to disrupt our great industrial concerns and force them, under the provisions of an antiquated law, to adopt and pursue destructive competitive methods, and our Government is in the anomalous position of prohibiting ruthless competition in the railroad world and demanding ruthless competition in the industrial world.

And he says, in conclusion:

> Create at once, in or out of the Department of Commerce and Labor, a business court or controlling commission composed largely of experienced business men.

And the logic of his position is, after that is done, repeal the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to repeal the Sherman antitrust law. Unless a powerful public opinion is constantly demanding it it will not be enforced. Experience teaches us that. So with it left upon the statute book they need to have no fear of its enforcement if some other remedy is found by which we assume to deal with this question. The same writer says:

> For 20 years our statesmen have been bending every energy to find out what the Sherman law means and endeavoring to enforce it regardless of the law of evolution, while the statesmen of other countries during the same period have been bending every energy to find out what the law of evolution means and endeavoring to conform to it. Our statesmen have their faces turned toward the past; the statesmen of other nations have their faces turned toward the future.

Another gentleman most prominently connected with large business interest and one of the ablest among them all has, in speaking of this subject, said:

> Since great benefits result from these consolidations, and yet possibilities of danger may arise from a misuse of their power, it would seem necessary to find some plan for preserving the benefits and eliminating the dangers by some sort of regulation.
> A corporation commission should be created similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, that was the real beginning of the propaganda. It followed immediately after the decision of the Standard Oil case and the Tobacco case. It has been going forward from that time until this. In many different ways we are advised that the Sherman law is a failure, that it interferes with the development and the evolution of business, that it should not be enforced and can not successfully be enforced, and that it is the duty of the Government to erect some kind of a commission to oversee these vast powers, to see that they do not do that which they ought not to do.

If I thought it would be within the power of the commission to stand against these tremendous monopolies and these vast financial units in the business world so that they could protect the citizen in a mere material way, I might in some measure yield my opposition. I do not believe, however, that even that could be done. But there would still be this proposition, that such a government as that in a hundred years would not be a republic at all. It is perfectly idle to say that when the great industries of the country shall have gone into the hands of 40, 50, or 100 or 500 men, wielding the power which they would wield in the political world, the influence which they would exert in elections, their power to corrupt elections and to control them, they would not in the end control the commissions which would have to do with their interests. They would have but one fight to make, but one Liege to capture, but one fortress to hold, and looking back over their past conduct at the merciless way in which they throttled competition, shall we doubt how effectively they would take to their work?

At this point, Mr. President, I want to read a statement from an article published lately by William G. Brown, entitled "The New Politics." He was, it seems to me, a man with a clear vision. There are some things in his book well worth the while for anyone to consider. He is speaking of this condition of affairs as to the preservation of democracy and the principles of democracy with these vast industrial units in existence, and he says:

But that these things are so does not rid us of the fact that the coming of the new order has meant a real loss of independence, of industrial freedom, to the great mass of individuals. Their chance to rise is a chance to rise in but one way—by obedience to the laws of the system to which they belong; and in the making of those laws they have had no voice. There is real independence only at the top; and to reach the top is beyond the hopes of any but a very, very few. In this respect the new order is, perhaps, more like the military system than anything else. Clearly it is less democratic, less in accord with the democratic ideal, less conducive to the democratic spirit and temper than the old.

On page 24 of the book he says:

The possibility, taken with the vastness of our extent and our wealth, is staggering. Four centuries ago the Medici were masters of Florence because they were supreme there in finance; but Florence at her best was but a city of perhaps 100,000 inhabitants, with a territory far smaller than that of our average single State. If, therefore, the Medici could make themselves so great a place in history and play so great a part in the life of their time, what might not they do who should establish even a like control over the limitless industry, the incalculable opulence, of America? In the presence of such power how could democracy survive? Such power could go far to corrupt the press. Less power has, in fact, already gone far to corrupt the press. Less power has already corrupted legislatures, has suborned executives, has reached even the courts. But these indirect and vile ways are not the only ways—perhaps not the most truly effective ways—in which such power would work to the undoing of democracy. When we shall have substituted the new order for the old régime of competition and free individual initiative in all the great industries, when every one of them shall be organized into a single system under a single-headed control and there shall be set above them all the money lenders, the financiers, themselves brought into an equal solidarity, we shall have gone far to deprive democracy of the very air which it must breathe to live. We shall have denied to the mass of individuals the use and practice of self-dependence, self-direction, the wont and exercise and habit of freedom, without which they can not fit themselves either to win it or preserve it.

Back of this whole question, sir, rising superior and dominant to the mere questions of prices and wages, is the question of whether a government founded on the principle of a democracy and an industrial system founded on the principle of absolutism can thrive in harmony under the same flag. Can you train men to the aspiration of freemen, endow them with the virtues of self-reliance and self-trust in the political arena, and satisfy them with a circumscribed, limited, and more or less slavish life in the industrial field? And with all our great industries, our natural resources in the hands of a few men, even regulated men, that is what it means to the masses. Can you under such an industrial system rear that class of citizens who can discharge the political obligations of government, who are to prove themselves commensurate with the duties and obligations which attach to all upon whose shoulders rests the weight of a republic. It is not sufficient that the ordinary citizen be placed in a sty and well bedded and well fed—no such men, sir, sustain free institutions; they must also have as a portion of their heritage the opportunity to rise, to share not only the material things which keep the soul within the body, but the things which fire the soul with the hope of enjoying the honor and the power and the glory of the country of which they feel themselves a part.

The next great struggle of Democracy, and the one which will test every timber in its mighty structure, will take place not on such fields as Gettysburg and Appomattox, but in the midst of the American market place. Can men and are men to stand there free and untrammeled from privilege and monopoly? There must be equal opportunity, so far as the laws and the economic policies of government are concerned. It will not be sufficient to say to freemen that this industry and that industry are in the hands of a most limited group of men well regulated; that this natural resource, coal or oil, is now in the hands and under the exclusive control of a certain family and a few friends, well regulated; that your protection against undue extortion is in a commission at Washington, with whose personnel you, as a practical fact, have nothing to do. It will not do to say that politically you are free; that you are citizens of a great Republic, but industrially you are circumscribed and limited and the door of opportunity has been closed.

Mr. President, this much we ought to know by this time—that there is only one safe rule with reference to those with whom we intrust great powers of government: First, that they shall perform their trusteeship under definite and specific rules of action or law which applies alike to all; second, that those who shall represent the people shall come from them and return to them at stated periods to render an account of their stewardship. There is only one safe rule, and that is that the man who makes the law and prescribes the rule of conduct shall, as our learned President so well said, represent not the expert view alone, but the ordinary common sense of the common citizens of the country. Let us read it again:

Everything I know about history, every bit of experience and observation that has contributed to my thought, has confirmed me in the conviction that the real wisdom of human life is compounded out of the experience of ordinary men.

Or to state it in another way, by one equally gifted in the power of expression:

The accumulated intellect of the masses is greater than the heaviest brain God ever gave to a single man.

Mr. President, that form of so-called democracy which turns itself over to the tender mercies of a bureaucracy, that form of so-called democracy which places its hopes and its reliance in and delegates all its powers to experts and depends upon rare and exceptional and heroic accomplishments and virtues rather than upon the composite wisdom of its millions of freemen, will end shortly in a sea of venality and corruption, and thereupon a period of disintegration and decay. In matters of government, as has been well said, the principles are vain and the talents wasted when they fail to secure national durability.

Mr. President, regulative or administrative commissions have their place in a republican form of government, but it is a limited sphere in which they should be permitted to act. The power to make the law, to prescribe the rules, to establish a rule of conduct which shall be a unit and applicable to all alike, must be lodged not in a commission or in an administrative body not selected or subject to the control of the people, but that power must be lodged alone with those who come fresh from the people from year to year, from decade to decade, that you may get the ordinary common sense of the common man and crystallize it into the rules of conduct as he desires them to be. The prime duty of all commissions is to investigate and report or to carry out the well-defined work authorized by the legislature. The sheriff is necessary, but we would scarcely permit the sheriff to be a lawmaker, a law interpreter, and a law executer all combined. These commissions, however, which we are creating, selected not by the people, exercise all the powers of government under this discretion which is given them of lawmaking, of interpretation, and of execution.

Mr. President, the great majority of the business men of this country are honest. They want to do business along lines which are in harmony with right conduct and with moral perceptions and principles; they do not need surveillance; they do not need to be controlled by a class of men whose business it is to oversee their conduct from day to day. Ninety-five per cent of the business men of this country have no trouble with the Sherman law at all; they have no trouble in observing those rules which one man and another would say are the rules of right conduct in the business world. There are but very few who have entered upon this field of creating vast monopolies through immoral and dishonest methods. Perhaps if we would name 300 men we could cover all the men in the United States who are directly responsible for this condition of affairs. This proposed law takes away the strength of the existing law so far as they are concerned by either actually leaving it out or discouraging the principle of criminal punishment, and it undertakes to deal rather with the ninety millions of men who so far have not seemed to require anything of that kind.

Mr. President, I am not at all concerned about the small matters with which some seem to think this Trade Commission will have to deal; they will right themselves and rectify themselves ninety-nine times out of one hundred in the business world. They have been found conducive to energy, to self-reliance, to self-help, and to business ability upon the part of the business world; but I am concerned about those two or three hundred men who have created a monopoly, who have taken advantage of franchise rights and special privileges, and have intrenched themselves in a way in the business world to interfere with and prevent the business success of the smaller man.

In my judgment there is only one way in which to deal with that class, and that is to destroy their power absolutely. I think the Attorney General, as was said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], has stated the fact correctly, that the fault with the Sherman law has been its lack of enforcement. Therefore, Mr. President, with the leave of the Senate I am going to try to find out something about the Sherman law and what we are prepared to do under it. There seems to be a view to the effect that that act is incomplete; that its definitions, as announced by the court, are difficult to understand; that men have difficulty in knowing what they are to do; and that it is incomplete and insufficient to accomplish the purposes for which it was passed.

That law was passed, Mr. President, in 1890, and has been upon the statute books now for over 23 years. For only about 6 or 7 years during its existence has there been any real attempt, in my judgment, to enforce it. It contains a provision for injunctive relief against the formation of these combines, a provision for the punishment of those who violate it, a provision for the forfeiture of property, and a provision for the dissolution of the combines after they are formed. It is wide-reaching, comprehensive, and now, under the decisions of the court, it covers every conceivable form of monopoly or of monopolistic practice. It is not a question of the insufficiency of the law, therefore, but it is a question of its enforcement.

But, as I said a moment ago and as I have said before, I would support any provision which would individualize the specific principles which have been announced by the court under that law, and attach to it a penalty for its nonobservance. Anything which would make easier the enforcement of the Sherman law, which would enable the party injured to recover his damages in a more expeditious and less costly way, anything which would enable him to go into the court without being confronted with the proposition of being ruined in the way of costs—all those provisions which would seek to simplify and expedite the enforcement of that law, would find support on my part. I believe, nevertheless, that there is now, under the decisions of the court, ample means on the part of the Government to enforce that law against every conceivable form of industrial monopoly.

Mr. President, the first decision under the Sherman antitrust law of any note was in what is known as the Knight case. The opinion rendered in that case was rather discouraging from the standpoint of those who believed in the law. I think the opinion as it was rendered was due largely to the peculiar state of the pleadings and the facts as they were adduced in the case. As said by the court in the rendition of the opinion, there was no specific allegation that the acts complained of were acts in contemplation of or having for their purpose the intent to control interstate commerce, and that there was no proof of the fact that that was the ultimate object and aim of the parties making the organization, notwithstanding the fact that the evidence was at hand and must have been procurable to prove that question beyond a doubt. In fact, it always seemed to me that that inference from the facts was irresistible. But whatever there was in that case, Mr. President, it has been fairly overruled by reason of later decisions; and no longer need we fear that because a transaction is one happening wholly within a State, with reference to the purchase of property within a State, or the purchase of stock within a State, or is participated in by a corporation operating under a State charter—no longer need we fear that that will interfere with the enforcement of the law as to a particular transaction in case the allegations of the complaint are in proper form and proof is adduced as to the ultimate object and purpose of the parties. No more complete answer could be had to the Knight case than is found in what is known as the Meat Trust case in One hundred and ninety-sixth United States; and I am going to read a paragraph or two from that decision. The court says:

> It will be noticed further that the intent to monopolize is alleged for the first time in the eighth section of the bill as to raising, lowering, and fixing prices. In the earlier sections the intent is reached to restrain competition among themselves. But after all the specific charges there is a general allegation that the defendants are conspiring with one another, the railroads and others, to monopolize the supply and distribution of fresh meats throughout the United States, etc., as has been stated above, and it seems to us that this general allegation of intent colors and applies to all the specific charges of the bill. Whatever may be thought concerning the proper construction of the statute, a bill in equity is not to be read and construed as an indictment would have been read and construed a hundred years ago, but it is to be taken to mean what it fairly conveys to a dispassionate reader by a fairly exact use of English speech.

The defense in this case was that these transactions were within a particular State of the Union; that it was the mere purchase of property upon the part of an individual or a corporation, the mere purchase of cattle or the manufacture of meat, and that therefore it came within the Knight case; but the court said:

> The scheme as a whole seems to us to be within reach of the law. The constituent elements, as we have stated them, are enough to give to the scheme a body and, for all that we can say, to accomplish it. Moreover, whatever we may think of them separately when we take them up as distinct charges, they are alleged sufficiently as elements of the scheme. It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful and that intent can make no difference. But they are bound together as the parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful. The statute gives this proceeding against combinations in restraint of commerce among the States and against attempts to monopolize the same. Intent is almost essential to such a combination and is essential to such an attempt. Where acts are not sufficient in themselves to produce a result which the law seeks to prevent—for instance, the monopoly—but require further acts in addition to the mere forces of nature to bring that result to pass, an intent to bring it to pass is necessary in order to produce a dangerous probability that it will happen. But when that intent and the consequent dangerous probability exists, this statute, like many others, and like the common law in some cases, directs itself against the dangerous probability as well as against the completed result. What we have said disposes incidentally of the objection to the bill as multifarious. The unity of the plan embraces all the parts.

Now, in view of some things which have been said here upon the floor of the Senate, I invite your attention to the language where it says that the Sherman law directs itself against the dangerous probability of a monopoly being formed as well as against the completed monopoly. Under the Sherman law, therefore, while, of course, if you were proceeding under the criminal feature of it, you would undoubtedly have to prove a completed monopoly, I entertain no doubt that in a court of equity it would be within the power of the Government whenever it is sought to form one of these monopolies to enjoin any act which tended to establish a monopoly or any monopolistic practice which would likely result in the creation of a monopoly as completely as the completed result could be enjoined and prohibited and dissolved. The law contemplates that injunctive relief may be had against all acts which are steps in the formation of a monopoly, and looks not alone to a completed monopoly, but to those acts or conditions which make it dangerously probable that a monopoly is to be formed or consummated.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the able Senator if the case from which he is reading did not come from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. No; this is the Meat Trust case.

Mr. LEWIS. It came up from Wisconsin, did it not?

Mr. BORAH. It came up from Illinois, I think; that is where the Meat Trust has its home. It came from the northern district of Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. It is a case found in One hundred and ninety-sixth United States. Again, the court said:

> Although the combination alleged embraces restraint and monopoly of trade within a single State, its effect upon commerce among the States is not accidental, secondary, remote, or merely probable. On the allegations of the bill the latter commerce, no less—perhaps even more—than commerce within a single State, is an object of attack. Moreover, it is a direct object; it is that for the sake of which the several specific acts and courses of conduct are done and adopted. Therefore the case is not like the United States v. E. C. Knight Co. (156 U. S., 1), where the subject matter of the combination was manufacture and the direct object monopoly of manufacture within a State. However likely monopoly of commerce among the States in the article manufactured was to follow from the agreement, it was not a necessary consequence nor a primary end. Here the subject matter is sales, and the very point of the combination is to restrain and monopolize commerce among the States in respect to such sales.

There can be no doubt, Mr. President, that, had the same allegations been made in the Knight case that were made in the Meat Trust case, the court would have arrived at the same conclusion. We therefore have it pretty well established that whenever a combination of separate acts go to make up a general scheme, which general scheme has for its purpose the control of interstate commerce, the mere fact that those acts, taken separately and by themselves, would be solely under the jurisdiction of the State, and matters of intrastate trade and commerce, does not take the transaction from out of the operation of the Sherman law; and every combine formed in a State, if it has for its ultimate object to specifically affect interstate commerce, may be dealt with under the Sherman antitrust law. It is the scheme—the purpose—which combines the separate acts and lifts the whole transaction within the purview of the law.

There was another opinion rendered early in the history of the law in what is known as the case of In re Greene in 52 Federal Reporter. This was another case in which the decision was against the Government, and it is well to give sufficient attention to it to enable us to see what is the effect of the later decisions with reference to the principle which was there announced. Reading from the syllabus—

> Congress has no authority under the commerce clause or any other provision of the Constitution to limit the right of a corporation created by a State in the acquisition, control, and disposition of property in the several States, and it is immaterial that such property or the products thereof may become the subjects of interstate commerce; and it is apparent that by the act of July 2, 1890, in relation to monopolies, Congress did not intend to declare that the acquisition by a State corporation of so large a part of any species of property as to enable the owners to control the traffic therein among the several States constituted a criminal offense.
> * * * * * * *
> To constitute the offense of "monopolizing or attempting to monopolize" trade or commerce among the States within the meaning of section 2 of said act it is necessary to acquire or attempt to acquire an exclusive right in such commerce by means which will prevent others from engaging therein.

All those propositions, Mr. President, have been dealt with by the Supreme Court since that time. I shall call attention to them briefly, but before doing so I want to call attention to the statement of facts upon which this opinion was rendered, that we may see that, so far as the principle here announced is concerned, it has been distinctly modified.

The first count then alleges that, in pursuance of said purpose and intent, they, under the form and guise of said Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co., on October 3, 1890, did, at Boston, within the district of Massachusetts, "negotiate a sale, and did sell," to the firm of D. T. Mills & Co., 5,642.82 proof gallons of alcohol, which was then in the State of Illinois; that by reason of said combination and of their control of the large number of distilleries and the manufacture of 75 per cent of all such products in the United States, they did fix the price at which said D. T. Mills & Co., who were dealers therein at Boston, should and did sell said alcohol within said district of Massachusetts, or for transportation into any other State, "and did compel said Mills & Co. to sell said alcohol within said district of Massachusetts for use in said district, or for transportation to other States of the United States, at no less price than that fixed" by the accused; that by this means they controlled the amount of distilled product sold within the State of Massachusetts, and did fix the price at which said products were sold by dealers in said State; that they thereby prevented and counteracted the effect of free competition on the usual price at which said products were sold within the State, and did increase and augment the usual price at which said distillery products were sold in the State of Massachusetts for use therein or transportation therefrom; and that they thereby, and by the means aforesaid, did "restrain the trade and commerce in said distilling products between the State of Massachusetts and the States of the said United States other than the State of Massachusetts," contrary to the form of the statutes in such case made and provided.

This was an instance in which the parties undertook to control the price to the ultimate consumer by a price between the distiller and the parties to whom they sold the product. They not only exercised the power which they had by reason of controlling a large supply of the output, but they entered into contracts providing for rebates to those who would sell at a certain price or agree expressly that they would not sell below a certain figure. This was held in this case of In re Green to be a transaction within the State, a mere sale of property, a matter of private contract, and a matter concerning the State alone and not subject to the terms of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. President, that principle has been entirely rejected. It has been renounced, as it were, by the courts, not only in a general course of reasoning, but by a specific reference to that kind of a transaction.

I call attention briefly to one case upon that subject, and that is the case in Two hundred and twentieth United States, at page 373:

The complainant, a manufacturer of proprietary medicines which are prepared in accordance with secret formulas, presents by its bill a system, carefully devised, by which it seeks to maintain certain prices fixed by it for all the sales of its products, both at wholesale and retail. Its purpose is to establish minimum prices at which sales shall be made by its vendees and by all subsequent purchasers who traffic in its remedies. Its plan is thus to govern directly the entire trade in the medicines it manufactures, embracing interstate commerce as well as commerce within the States, respectively. To accomplish this result it has adopted two forms of restrictive agreements limiting trade in the articles to those who become parties to one or the other. The one sort of contract known as "Consignment contract—Wholesale," has been made with over 400 jobbers and wholesale dealers; and the other, described as "Retail agency contract," with 25,000 retail dealers in the United States.

In the body of the opinion it is further stated:

That these agreements restrain trade is obvious. That, having been made, as the bill alleges, with "most of the jobbers and wholesale druggists and a majority of the retail druggists of the country," and having for their purpose the control of the entire trade, they relate directly to interstate as well as intrastate trade, and operate to restrain trade or commerce among the several States, is also clear.

It will be seen by reading this opinion that the facts are somewhat similar to the facts stated in the account of the case of In re Green. In other words, it was an attempt to control the price of the product by having a contract which prevented the retail salesmen from selling below a certain price. That having been declared in the case of In re Green to be, in effect, not in contravention of the Sherman law, the same contention was made in this case. The Supreme Court distinctly declared, however, that such a principle can not be permitted to obtain, and that any contract which has for its ultimate effect or purpose the control of the price of the product has a tendency to restrain trade and is in violation of the Sherman law, notwithstanding the fact that the contract was made and completed wholly within a single State. The court in a clear and conclusive way limited the right of a party as to the manner of disposing of his own property if the manner of that disposal had the effect of restraining interstate commerce.

Mr. President, I have called attention to the Green case and these other cases for the reason that they have often been regarded as announcing a principle which would be difficult of application in the successful enforcement of the Sherman law. In so far as those cases announced any rule which would be inimical to the successful enforcement of that law, the rule has been renounced by the Supreme Court.

I desire now to take up some of the decisions which discuss the Sherman law, its wide reach, and its most comprehensive scope, with reference to all kinds and conceivable forms of monopolies and restraints of trade. As I do so, I wish to submit to the Senate this proposition and have it answered, if anyone can conceive of an answer. That is, what form of monopoly, what possible combination in restraint of interstate commerce, can you conceive of that may not be reached and destroyed under the principles which are now established by the Supreme Court in its decisions under the Sherman antitrust law? Is there any form of monopoly or monopolistic practice or restraint of trade which directly affects interstate commerce that will not be found to come within the clear announcement of the principles of the Supreme Court in the rendition of these different decisions? They have covered the entire field and dealt with all kinds of practices and have not only denounced the specified practices but announced general principles which are a guide as to future practices. It seems to me that we are fairly safe in saying that every conceivable form of conduct heretofore arising has been specifically referred to; and where not specifically referred to, general principles have been announced which bring them within the law, whatever they may be.

Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that I am discussing a subject with which the Members of the Senate are just as familiar as I am, and I shall not be able to throw any light on it, so far as they are concerned. I have engaged myself to do this, however, for the sole reason of getting into the RECORD the scope of these decisions, so that there may not be any misunderstanding in the country at large, if anyone cares to investigate it, as to the scope of the opinions, as to the power which we have under the Sherman antitrust law to deal with this entire subject; that it is not a question of having the power, of having the law defined, of knowing what we should do, how we should do it, or of our capacity under the law to effectuate our purposes, but it is simply and solely a question of courage to go forward and do it. If we are in favor of terminating the existence of industrial monopoly in this country, after 20 years of contest and after repeated decisions by the Supreme Court, we find ourselves now, on the 30th day of September, 1914, with the power in our hands, the decisions clear and definite, and the punishment condign and certain, if we have the courage to go forward and do it.

The first case to which I call attention is that of the United States against the Freight Association. In this case an effort was made to take the railroads from under the operation of the law. It was argued that it could not have been in contemplation of the makers of the law that railroads should be included. But the court held that the railroads must be considered as coming under the terms of the act, and further held that the particular contract involved, which contract in general terms undertook to agree upon certain rates to be charged, was inhibited. I quote briefly from the opinion:

The point urged on the defendant's part is that the statute was not really intended to reach that kind of an agreement, relating only to traffic rates entered into by competing common carriers, by railroads; that it was intended to reach only those who were engaged in the manufacture or sale of articles of commerce and who, by means of trusts, combinations, and conspiracies, were engaged in affecting supplies or the price or place of manufacture of such articles. The terms of the act do not bear out such construction. Railroad companies are instruments of commerce and their business commerce itself.

The court then takes up the contract and holds that it was in restraint of trade and in violation of the law, and that its violation could not be valid by allegations of an intention or of a desire to simply maintain reasonable rates. The only comment which I would make upon this decision when passing is that the contract which was here condemned was a contract which would have been held to have been in unreasonable restraint of trade or void at common law. All contracts were void at common law which were in restraint of trade, except that class of contracts which were incidental to a primary contract, such as an agreement to remain out of business when selling the business or an agreement when entering into a partnership not to go into business which was in competition with the partnership.

I need not take up the case of The United States against the Joint Traffic Association, in the One hundred and seventy-first United States, for it is largely a review and a reconsideration of the same questions which were decided in the Trans-Missouri Association.

I next direct the attention of the Senate to the Pipe Co. case, in the One hundred and seventy-fifth United States. This is one of the most important of the cases. It involved a contract in iron pipes between a large number of manufacturing companies, which contract was to the effect that these companies should maintain certain prices and share the profits. It was provided that in pursuance of the general plan no one should sell iron pipe to any purchaser without the permission of the combination, and as most of their dealings were with municipal corporations, they had an arrangement as to the manner in which they should do the bidding. The opinion in the case below was rendered by ex-President Taft, and is one of the most illuminating and instructive of all the decisions which have been rendered in the consideration of this law.

The contract was held void, and it was held that it would have been void at common law. Had the court continued to adhere closely to the Sugar Trust case, there might have been difficulty in holding this contract void, but it was clearly perceived that the intent of all these transactions was to control sales in interstate commerce.

I quote a single sentence from the decision of the Supreme Court in this case:

> Where the contract is for the sale of the article and for its delivery in another State, the transaction is one of interstate commerce, although the vendor may have also agreed to manufacture it in order to fulfill his contract of sale. In such case a combination of this character would be properly called a combination in restraint of interstate commerce, and not one relating only to manufacture.

I next consider the Northern Securities case. I first invite attention to the terms of the State charter. I read from the statement of facts:

> Its certificate of incorporation stated that the objects for which the company was formed were:
> "1. To acquire by purchase, subscription, or otherwise, and to hold as investment, any bonds or other securities or evidences of indebtedness, or any shares of capital stock created or issued by any other corporation or corporations, association or associations, of the State of New Jersey, or of any other State, Territory, or country.
> "2. To purchase, hold, sell, assign, transfer, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise dispose of any bonds or other securities or evidences of indebtedness created or issued by any other corporation or corporations, association or associations, of the State of New Jersey, or of any other State, Territory, or country, and while owner thereof to exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges of ownership.
> "3. To purchase, hold, sell, assign, transfer, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise dispose of shares of the capital stock of any other corporation or corporations, association or associations, of the State of New Jersey, or of any other State, Territory, or country, and while owner of such stock to exercise all the rights, powers, and privileges of ownership, including the right to vote thereon.
> "4. To aid in any manner any corporation or association of which any bonds or other securities or evidences of indebtedness or stock are held by the corporation, and to do any acts or things designed to protect, preserve, improve, or enhance the value of any such bonds or other securities or evidences of indebtedness or stock.
> "5. To acquire, own, and hold such real and personal property as may be necessary or convenient for the transaction of its business."
>
> * * * * * * *
> The duration of the corporation was to be perpetual.

Mr. President, here was a corporation organized to do practically everything that one would want to do in the way of creating a monopoly. So the Supreme Court had to meet the proposition that that which those men had done they were authorized to do by a charter from a Commonwealth of the Union, and that any criticism of conduct upon their part was apparently a criticism of the action of a sovereign State.

I might say here in passing, too, that if the people of this country really desire to be rid of monopoly, all they have to do is to take away the power which they have given these people to create monopolies. Far back in the history of the Supreme Court they rendered a decision to the effect that a corporation could not exercise any power other than the power which was specifically given it by the terms of the charter; that if it wanted to exercise a power it must put its finger upon the plain provision of the charter which authorized it to do so. In addition, they held that one corporation could not hold the stock of another corporation. So, after having these opinions, the men who desired to create monopoly and to exercise monopolistic power went to the different State legislatures and secured the power by which they built up these vast combines or monopolies. There is not to-day in existence in the Union a combine or a monopoly of which I have any knowledge that does not exist by virtue of specific authority from some State legislature.

If the principles announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in its early decisions, and in its later decisions with reference to the powers of corporations, and what they could do and could not do, had been observed by the different legislatures of this country as announced by the court, and had been regarded as sound principles of corporate power, in my judgment we would not be to-day contending with the question of monopolies in this country at all. No individual builds up a monopoly of any vast proportions. He goes and secures authority from some State to organize a corporation with vast charter powers, such powers as no State should ever grant.

So, in this case, when these men concluded to combine the holdings of stock of the two railroad companies they sought corporate authority from a State of the Union. When they were brought into court that was one of their defenses and one of the difficult subjects with which the court had to deal; but its solution vastly clarified the right and authority of the Government of the United States to deal with questions of monopoly under the Sherman antitrust law.

The court goes on to say:

> The Government charges that if the combination was held not to be in violation of the act of Congress, then all efforts of the National Government to preserve to the people the benefits of free competition among carriers engaged in interstate commerce will be wholly unavailing, and all transcontinental lines, indeed the entire railway systems of the country, may be absorbed, merged, and consolidated, thus placing the public at the absolute mercy of the holding corporation.

Commenting upon this, Justice Harlan said:

> The mere existence of such a combination and the power acquired by the holding company as its trustee constitute a menace to and a restraint upon that freedom of commerce which Congress intended to recognize and protect, and which the public is entitled to have protected. If such combination be not destroyed, all the advantages that would naturally come to the public under the operation of the general laws of competition, as between the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway Cos., will be lost, and the entire commerce of the immense territory in the northern part of the United States between the Great Lakes and the Pacific at Puget Sound will be at the mercy of a single holding corporation organized in a State distant from the people of that territory.
> How far may Congress go in regulating the affairs or conduct of State corporations engaged as carriers in commerce among the States or of State corporations which, although not directly engaged themselves in such commerce, yet have control of the business of interstate carriers? If State corporations, or their stockholders, are found to be parties to a combination, in the form of a trust or otherwise, which restrains interstate or international commerce, may they not be compelled to respect any rule for such commerce that may be lawfully prescribed by Congress?

Before taking up the question Justice Harlan reviewed the cases which had been decided theretofore under the Sherman antitrust law, and announced the principles which had been announced and which I am going to read into the RECORD.

Up to the time of the rendition of the opinion in the Northern Securities case the following principles had been announced by the court, and they cover a very wide field of activity. Justice Harlan says:

> It is sufficient to say that from the decisions in the above cases certain propositions are plainly deducible and embrace the present case. Those propositions are:
> That although the act of Congress known as the antitrust act has no reference to the mere manufacture or production of articles or commodities within the limits of the several States, it does embrace and declare to be illegal every contract, combination, or conspiracy, in whatever form, of whatever nature, and whoever may be parties to it, which directly or necessarily operates in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations.
> * * * * * * *
> That railroad carriers engaged in interstate or international trade or commerce are embraced by the act;
> That combinations, even among private manufacturers or dealers, whereby interstate or international commerce is restrained are equally embraced by the act;
> That Congress has the power to establish rules by which interstate and international commerce shall be governed, and by the antitrust act has prescribed the rule of free competition among those engaged in such commerce:
> That every combination or conspiracy which would extinguish competition between otherwise competing railroads engaged in interstate trade or commerce, and which would in that way restrain such trade or commerce, is made illegal by the act;
> That the natural effect of competition is to increase commerce, and an agreement whose direct effect is to prevent this play of competition restrains instead of promoting trade and commerce;
> That to vitiate a combination such as the act of Congress condemns it need not be shown that the combination in fact results or will result in a total suppression of trade or in a complete monopoly—

That would be a complete answer to the Green case—

> but it is only essential to show that by its necessary operation it tends to restrain interstate or international trade or commerce or tends to create a monopoly in such trade or commerce and to deprive the public of the advantages that flow from free competition.

Let me digress here to say that at this particular time a very earnest defense is being made by very able men upon the political rostrum, of one of the great combines and monopolies of this country because thus far it has not seen fit to oppress those who deal with it. That is recited as a justification for the existence of that monopoly—that thus far it has dealt fairly with its competitors; that thus far it has not oppressed those who purchase its goods; and therefore, notwithstanding it be a monopoly, in so far as its conduct has been satisfactory it should not be condemned.

That defense is being made for one of the most unconscionable, illegal, and indefensible monopolies that now exists. It goes to the very kernel of one of the contentions which we make who are in favor of the Sherman law. It pronounces a death sentence upon monopoly when it exists, not by reason of any particular conduct of which it may be guilty, but because the combination of such power is dangerous to the interests of the people of the Republic, and the industrial world will not be subjected to the mercy or the beneficence of that kind of a power. No combine having built itself up through wrongful methods, having taken practical possession of an industry through monopolistic methods, should be heard to say we are entitled to be let alone because we are not now utilizing our power in a wrongful way.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WEST. Under that construction they wanted a beneficent monopoly to be undisturbed under the law, as I understand the Senator. Was that it?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. That is the argument which is being made in defense of one of our monopolies—that thus far it has dealt kindly; and notwithstanding the fact that the court found it was a monopoly and ordered its dissolution, the court is criticized for doing so because of the fact that they claim the evidence showed that thus far, at least, they had not oppressed the purchasers or the dealers in their products as greatly as they might have done.

The court further says:

That the constitutional guaranty of liberty of contract does not prevent Congress from prescribing the rule of free competition for those engaged in interstate and international commerce; and,

That under its power to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, Congress had authority to enact the statute in question.

* * * * * * *

Underlying the argument in behalf of the defendants is the idea that as the Northern Securities Co. is a State corporation, and as its acquisition of the stock of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway companies is not inconsistent with the powers conferred by its charter, the enforcement of the act of Congress, as against those corporations, will be an unauthorized interference by the National Government with the internal commerce of the States creating those corporations. This suggestion does not at all impress us. There is no reason to suppose that Congress had any purpose to interfere with the internal affairs of the States, nor, in our opinion, is there any ground whatever for the contention that the antitrust act regulates their domestic commerce. By its very terms the act regulates only commerce among the States and with foreign States. Viewed in that light, the act, if within the powers of Congress, must be respected, for by the explicit words of the Constitution that instrument and the laws enacted by Congress in pursuance of its provisions are the supreme law of the land, "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding"—supreme over the States, over the courts, and even over the people of the United States, the source of all power under our governmental system in respect of the objects for which the National Government was ordained. An act of Congress constitutionally passed under its power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is binding upon all; as much so as if it were embodied, in terms, in the Constitution itself. Every judicial officer, whether of a National or a State court, is under the obligation of an oath so to regard a lawful enactment of Congress. Not even a State, still less one of its artificial creatures, can stand in the way of its enforcement. If it were otherwise, the Government and its laws might be prostrated at the feet of local authority.

In other words, Mr. President, we have nothing to do with the creation of State corporations, nothing to say as to what terms shall be incorporated in their charters; but we have the power to say that no State corporation can enter the channels of interstate trade except upon such terms as the Congress of the United States dictates. We have the power to say that a State corporation must purge itself of certain acts or conduct, or the result of certain acts or conduct, before it may enjoy the right to enter the channels of interstate trade. So the Supreme Court put an end to the contention that some peculiar right arose by reason of an authority granted to the corporation by the State which did not belong to a State or did not belong to an individual, to wit, to interfere with interstate commerce.

It is said that whatever may be the power of a State over such subjects, Congress can not forbid single individuals from disposing of their stock in a State corporation, even if such corporation be engaged in interstate and international commerce; that the holding or purchase by a State corporation, or the purchase by individuals, of the stock of another corporation, for whatever purpose, are matters in respect of which Congress has no authority under the Constitution; that, so far as the power of Congress is concerned, citizens or State corporations may dispose of their property and invest their money in any way they choose; and that in regard to all such matters citizens and State corporations are subject, if to any authority, only to the lawful authority of the State in which such citizens reside or under whose laws such corporations are organized. It is unnecessary in this case to consider such abstract, general questions. The court need not now concern itself with them. They are not here to be examined and determined, and may well be left for consideration in some case necessarily involving their determination.

* * * * * * *

We do not understand that the Government makes any such contentions or takes any such positions as those statements imply. It does not contend that Congress may control the mere acquisition or the mere ownership of stock in a State corporation engaged in interstate commerce. Nor does it contend that Congress can control the organization of State corporations authorized by their charters to engage in interstate and international commerce. But it does contend that Congress may protect the freedom of interstate commerce by any means that are appropriate and that are lawful and not prohibited by the Constitution. It does contend that no State corporation can stand in the way of the enforcement of the national will, legally expressed. What the Government particularly complains of—indeed, all that it complains of here—is the existence of a combination among the stockholders of competing railroad companies which in violation of the act of Congress restrains interstate and international commerce through the agency of a common corporate trustee designated to act for both companies in repressing free competition between them. Independently of any question of the mere ownership of stock or of the organization of a State corporation, can it in reason be said that such a combination is not embraced by the very terms of the antitrust act? May not Congress declare that combination to be illegal? If Congress legislates for the protection of the public, may it not proceed on the ground that wrongs when effected by a powerful combination are more dangerous and require more stringent supervision than when they are to be effected by a single person? (Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S., 540, 556.) How far may the courts go in order to give effect to the act of Congress and remedy the evils it was designed by that act to suppress? These are confessedly questions of great moment, and they will now be considered.

So, Mr. President, the court takes up the question of the power of State corporations to in any way authorize acts which the National Congress had declared to be inhibited or to constitute the means by which a combination could be formed which would have a tendency to restrain trade or create a monopoly in interstate commerce.

It does not seem at this time, Mr. President, so serious and so profound a question as it did at the time it was being so strenuously presented by those who are now contending that the Sherman antitrust law should be repealed. The contest went on with vigor and with great force and effect in presenting these different schemes by which to emasculate the Sherman antitrust law until the Supreme Court took up one after another of these questions and dealt with them finally and conclusively. When the time arrived that all avenues seemed closed they ceased their contest and entered upon the proposition of a repeal or emasculation of the Sherman antitrust law, and schemes providing other methods with which to deal with monopoly which in the end would have the effect of rendering the Sherman law a dead letter. From the time that these several propositions were announced and the broad and comprehensive principles presented to this country by the court until this time the propaganda has gone forward that this law, which was once considered insufficient and ineffective, is now too efficient and too effective to enable them to proceed along the lines they desired to proceed and must be repealed or rendered a dead letter. The court says:

If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to these objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States.

Upon page 344 of the decision the court says:

And all, we take it, will agree, as established firmly by the decisions of this court, that the power of Congress over commerce extends to all the instrumentalities of such commerce, and to every device that may be employed to interfere with the freedom of commerce among the States and with foreign nations. Equally, we assume, all will agree that the Constitution and the legal enactments of Congress are, by express words of the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution and laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. Nevertheless, the defendants, strangely enough, invoke in their behalf the tenth amendment of the Constitution, which declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people"; and we are confronted with the suggestion that any order or decree of the Federal court which will prevent the Northern Securities Co. from exercising the power it acquired in becoming the holder of the stocks of the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway Cos. will be an invasion of the rights of the State under which the Securities Co. was chartered, as well as of the rights of the States creating the other companies. In other words, if the State of New Jersey gives a charter to a corporation, and even if the obtaining of such charter is in fact pursuant to a combination under which it becomes the holder of the stocks of shareholders in two competing, parallel railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce in other States, whereby competition between the respective roads of those companies is to be destroyed and the enormous commerce carried on over them restrained by suppressing competition, Congress must stay its hands and allow such restraint to continue to the detriment of the public because, forsooth, the corporations concerned or some of them are State corporations. We can not conceive how it is possible for anyone to seriously contend for such a proposition. It means nothing less than that Congress, in regulating interstate commerce, must act in subordination to the will of the States when exerting their power to create corporations. No such view can be entertained for a moment.

I shall not read further. But the court dealt with the entire subject of the relation of the Government and State corporate charters, of the right of private contract, of the power of Congress, full and complete, to fix a rule for interstate commerce, and held that the scheme was inhibited and must be dissolved.

On page 351 of the report Justice Harlan makes a general statement which I think it worth while to record:

It is the history of monopolies in this country and in England that predictions of ruin are habitually made by them when it is attempted, by legislation, to restrain their operations and to protect the public against their exactions. In this, as in former cases, they seek shelter behind the reserved rights of the States and even behind the constitutional guarantee of liberty of contract. But this court has heretofore adjudged that the act of Congress did not touch the rights of the States and that liberty of contract did not involve a right to deprive the public of the advantages of free competition in trade and commerce. Liberty of contract does not imply liberty in a corporation or individuals to defy the national will, when legally expressed. Nor does the enforcement of a legal enactment of Congress infringe, in any proper sense, the general inherent right of everyone to acquire and hold property.

The dissenting opinion in what is known as the Knight case in effect became the leading opinion of the court in the Northern Securities case. Many of the questions which were up in the former case were, to some extent at least, up for consideration in this case.

Mr. President, where lies the trouble with reference to the Sherman law? What is the defect of it that we need other remedies or other means? Wherein has the Government lost in any of its contentions? What principle has it contended for which has not been finally allowed? What form of monopoly can exist under it? What form of restraint of trade can exist under it? The Government, as I said a moment ago, has been successful in all its contentions. The disturbance has arisen, it seems to me, over the fact that it has been successful, not that it has failed, but that it has been successful.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. The conclusion to which the Senator arrives is that really there is no necessity for any elaborate program of legislation upon the subject with which this measure deals—that the field is already entirely covered?

Mr. BORAH. No; not exactly that, Mr. President. I said a while ago that I am entirely in harmony with the proposition of any line of legislation which would enable, for instance, individuals who had been injured by reason of these laws to recover more easily, with less cost, under the Sherman law their threefold damages.

Mr. WALSH. They will have the right to maintain action under the Sherman Act, and the Senator would give them a little better rule of evidence?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; as evidenced by some of the amendments which were formerly added to this bill.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire of the Senator, then, if, in his view, it would not be necessary to denounce price cutting and tying in contracts and other so-called monopolistic practices because they were already under the condemnation of the law?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; I stated the contrary in the former part of my remarks, that wherever these specific acts which were conceded to be well within the principle of the Sherman antitrust law could be individualized and the process with reference to their enforcement simplified, such as tying contracts and cutting prices, and so forth, I would be in favor of that, and of attaching to the violation of any such law a severe penalty. But if the Senator gets my view of it, it is this: I am opposed to defining those things and then turning the enforcement over to the discretion of a commission.

Mr. WALSH. I understand. The Senator, however, takes the view that they are all now punishable under the Sherman Act?

Mr. BORAH. I have not any doubt that they are inhibited by the principles of the Sherman law, though not to be dealt with except in equity as separate acts.

Mr. WALSH. And that unless some of our legislation, enacted or prospective, should take their right away they would be subject to punishment under that law?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if I understand the Senator correctly that would be true, if he is speaking of them as ingredients of the Sherman law; and there might be cases where a separate act would be punishable.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I take it the Senator does not share the apprehension of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that these practices will now go on without any necessity or concern on the part of those pursuing them of amenability to the criminal law?

Mr. BORAH. I rather agree with the Senator from Missouri, for this reason. As I said a few moments ago, the result of this legislation will be that the Sherman law will become a dead letter.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator believes that the prosecution will be through the trade commission rather than through the criminal courts?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But the Senator recalls the provision here that the procedure before the Federal trade commission by no means prevents the prosecution under the Sherman Act?

Mr. BORAH. As a matter of law, it does not prevent it; but in the practical operation of these bills I entertain no doubt that as a practical fact these questions will be settled before the trade commission.

The court proceeds with the subject——

Mr. WALSH. That is the position, I understand, of the Senator, but——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Mississippi will pardon me a minute—that the liability under the law to criminal penalties exist, I understand the Senator entertains no doubt?

Mr. BORAH. I think there is no doubt about that; that is, that men can, as a legal proposition, be punished under the Sherman law; but I fear the intention is never to do so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was just going to ask if the Senator from Idaho thinks there is anything in the measure which he is now discussing before the Senate that repeals in any way the provisions of the Sherman law? I understand he does not think there is, but he believes it would become a dead letter by custom.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is my view. I do not contend that the Trade Commission act or anything in this bill actually repeals any of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. I did not understand the Senator from Missouri to say that. I would hesitate to differ from the Senator from Missouri upon any legal proposition, but I do not entertain that view. I am not at all of the opinion that it actually, in legal effect, destroys any of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law; but I have no doubt that in the practical operation of this law the Sherman antitrust law will come to be regarded as cumbersome, drastic, too severe, calculated to disturb business, and that it will be infinitely better both for the country, so it will be argued, for these men to be brought before the commission and told not to do that any more, and infinitely more in accord with their theory that they go there than to be proceeded with under the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator, will not that depend very largely upon the kind of an Attorney General we have?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it will depend very largely upon that.

Mr. WALSH. And, of course, the kind of Attorney General we will have will depend very largely upon the kind of a President of the United States we will have.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose so.

Mr. WALSH. Likewise, Mr. President, does it not occur to the Senator that when the Federal Trade Commission investigates one of these organizations and discovers that it is engaged in practices of this character, and issues its order enjoining it from perpetrating them any longer, the matter becomes public property, the facts in relation to past transgressions are developed, and we are likely in that way to get prosecutions for past offenses that would otherwise have never been noticed at all?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President, I do not entertain that view. That state of facts being disclosed, I do not think it necessary to have any more facts than we have in regard to violations of the Sherman antitrust law. But I would not at all oppose a commission to ascertain facts in relation to the violation of the Sherman law. What I object to is that part of the Trade Commission act which by order would regulate these monopolies and their practices. I would have them gather the facts and report them to the Department of Justice for action.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, the idea occurred to me most prominently in connection with the New Haven Railroad Co. The idea of prosecuting the directors of the New Haven Railroad Co. was a most nebulous idea in the public mind. Just as soon as the Interstate Commerce Commission investigated the matter and the testimony was published to the world immediately a demand went out for the criminal prosecution of the men concerned in those nefarious practices; and, responsive to public demand and public opinion as well, I take it, as to the enlightenment which the Department of Justice got, that prosecution is going on to-day.

Mr. BORAH. I have been informed from reliable sources, which I have no reason to doubt, that in that case the Department of Justice, long before the investigation took place, was prepared to prosecute and intended to prosecute.

Mr. WALSH. I feel quite certain they have been confirmed in that purpose by the public view.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think very likely the public did have something to do with that; that is, so far as certain parties were concerned; but I do not think it affected the Attorney General very much.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have much admiration, I beg to state, for the judgment and opinion of the Senator from Idaho, and, if I understood him correctly, his view of the situation is that the adoption of the conference report would tend to make the Sherman antitrust law a dead letter. Am I correct?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is my view.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask if, in the Senator's judgment, any step that would tend to lessen the force of or tend to make the Sherman antitrust law a dead letter would not be a public calamity?

Mr. BORAH. I would so regard it.

Mr. President, perhaps I had better again state, as I intended to state and thought I did state in the opening when there were not so many Senators present as there are now, that I do not contend that this conference report, if adopted, will repeal any of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. I said in the beginning that my objection to the report took a wider range and was broader, and that was to what I considered to be the initiation of a new policy; not as to what the legal and technical effect of the adoption of this report would be, but as to what it will be in its practical operation and in a practical working out of this proposition; the Senate knows that there is a tremendous propaganda going on in this country to the effect that these prosecutions should not be maintained at all; that prosecutions under the Sherman law are ill-advised; that they are calculated to disturb business; that without these monopolies and combines we can not compete with the other nations of the earth in commerce; that they are an evolutionary growth; that they are wise and beneficent institutions; that they give us cheaper products; that the people are generally benefited; that the only thing which should be done in regard to them is that an occasional bad practice should be inhibited by some commission; and that the desire to have a commission is that they may go on serenely and undisturbed with all their special privileges, their assumption of power, their vast commercial advantage, and remain undisturbed in their integrity of organization, but that any practice which might seem to be unfair between them and some competitor may be inhibited by a commission.

That is the trend, as I readily recognize and frankly admit, of public opinion at this time; and, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has just said, public opinion has very largely to do with it. If public opinion continues to approve of that course, as it apparently does at this time, the Sherman antitrust law will become a dead letter, and its enforcement will not be followed up, but the mere inhibition of what is conceded to be or thought to be unfortunate practices will go on. In the end, however, Mr. President, and in the course of a few years, those commissions will come to imbibe the same feeling and the same spirit with reference to vast corporations and great combines and monopolies—that they are essential, that they are indispensable to our commercial supremacy, that they are beneficent institutions—and therefore those commissions, too, will look with a great deal of favor upon anything in the way of unfair competition that is not notoriously and indefensibly bad. Now, I am opposed to monopoly. I think its presence a menace. I know it is the parent of inequalities, of classes, the fruitful source of luxury and dissipation on the one hand and want and misery on the other. They divide our people into classes, breed discontent and hatred, and in the end riot, bloodshed, and French revolutions.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not at all unmindful of the sentiment of which the Senator speaks and of the powerful sources from which it emanates nor of the influence that it exerts; I am further not unmindful, and am not entirely free from apprehension in the matter, that those same individuals look possibly to this legislation as the realization of their hopes in that direction; but, Mr. President, I have not sounded public sentiment as has the Senator, namely, that that sentiment is now growing, and that it is in a way dominant at the present time. My own conviction is that there never was in this country up to this good day so healthy a sentiment in favor of unrestricted competition, in favor of the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law and of every law as that which exists at the present time.

The Senator from Idaho has well said that law was a dormant statute until less than 10 years ago. It was dormant because the public were not particularly concerned in the enforcement of the statute; they had not waked up to the necessity of the matter; the ideas of which the Senator now speaks were then in the ascendancy; they were entertained by people in high places in official life and in business life as well, and through them very largely permeated the community as a whole; but I am inclined to think that the other sentiment is now growing, and quite outweighs the idea that we ought to tolerate and regulate monopoly.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is usually very accurate in his statements, but I must take issue with him when he makes the statement that the public has not waked up to the necessity of enforcing the Sherman antitrust law. The public was awake on this subject long before the Sherman antitrust law was passed. The Department of Justice only recently awoke from a deep sleep on the subject.

Mr. LEWIS. If I may be permitted at this particular juncture to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to a matter, I invite his attention to this viewpoint: If the Senator from Idaho is accurate in his fear that there is now an increased sentiment, which has been growing, against the enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that because of such there will come a time when all resort will be limited to the preventive act, known as the trade commission act; and I ask the Senator if it would not be true that, if such sentiment did prevail, then prosecutions initiated under the Sherman Antitrust Act would be absolutely futile, because such sentiment would actually prevent convictions? Does not the Senator feel such would be true?

Mr. BORAH. I think the logic of the Senator from Illinois is sound if the premises are admitted; but I would want to make an addition to that presentation, which is what I am, in my humble way, trying to do now, and that is to see if there can not be some retarding of the public sentiment in that direction.

Mr. LEWIS. Might I suggest to the Senator this thought, therefore: Since it is apparent that if the premises which he fears exist, they would undoubtedly restrain proceedings under the act; and if proceedings were instituted they would tend to paralyze any hope of conviction, because public sentiment would be against the trial of such cases. Would it not be well, under such conditions, that we have some preventive act, such as the Trade Commission act, or some such body as the Trade Commission, in order at the outset to avoid combinations, which at the end would not have been prosecuted with success?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President, of course, if we are to give up the rigid enforcement of the Sherman Act or abandon the proposition as perhaps an unsuccessful principle, or a principle which can not be enforced successfully, I presume that we ought to try to create a commission to deal with some of the more obnoxious features of monopoly; but, Mr. President, I am opposed to admitting the necessity, I am opposed to admitting the principle of the regulation of industrial monopoly at all. I said in the beginning of my remarks that it may be that it is coming; it may be that others are going to yield to the proposition, but not I. I am so thoroughly convinced that this propaganda is being carried on with success from the same sources that derived their existence from monopoly and their supply from monopoly that I believe, if it is properly presented to the country, the people will not accept it. Men whom the people have absolute confidence in are advocating to-day the regulation of monopoly, while the men who are behind the scenes and directing its course are the men who are closely allied with the great monopolies of this country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator's trend of thought; he is making a very attractive and illuminating speech, but his statement is a very remarkable one. I take it that he means by it that the forces behind this legislation are the men who were sought to be curbed by the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; I do not believe that the men who are in charge of this legislation——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should, speaking more properly, not have said "the men," but rather the influences, the interests which the Sherman law was intended to restrain and correct are the ones that are now urging this legislation as a palliative—a kind of delusion and a snare.

Mr. BORAH. I believe that to be true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is a very remarkable statement, and I am not prepared to say the able Senator is in error in his surmises. These great interests work in mysterious ways their schemes to perfect.

Mr. BORAH. I do not mean to say by that, however, that all those who are in favor of this kind of legislation are by any means swayed by that influence to which the Senator from Mississippi has referred. I do not want to be misunderstood on that for a moment. I think that there are people who believe that this legislation will have the effect of restraining monopoly; and I think that some of those who are most urgent in support of this measure are perfectly sincere in their belief that it will have the effect of helping to restrain or destroy monopoly. I do not want, Mr. President, to be understood in any other light.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Idaho recalls, does he not, that this bill permits prosecutions under the antitrust law?

Mr. BORAH. I so understand.

Mr. CULBERSON. In order, Mr. President, that it may appear in the RECORD at this point, if the Senator will permit me I will read the paragraph from section 11 of the conference report. It is as follows:

> No order of the commission or board or the judgment of the court to enforce the same shall in any wise relieve or absolve any person from any liability under the antitrust acts.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that, Mr. President, and I have already stated in answer to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that I do not contend that there is anything in this proposed act which, as a legal proposition, would relieve anyone from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law. As a legal proposition, I agree with the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Montana. I do not think that is true. I tried to make it plain in my opening statement that that would not be the legal effect of it, but that such would be the effect of it in the practical operation or the working out of this proposition. It would be a substitute, as it were, for the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law against these objectionable acts on the part of the combines and monopolies; it would be deemed sufficient and efficient for the Trade Commission to deal with them without going to the prosecution or to a dissolution of them under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Now let me make this prediction: I have often been warned not to make prophecies, but let me make the prediction that if the Trade Commission is at all successful, if it is established, and the law creating it remains upon the statute books, in less than 10 years you will never hear of an action to dissolve a monopoly under the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, is not the philosophy and theory of this bill and of the Trade Commission bill that its enforcement will prevent the creation of trusts and combinations and monopolies rather than to regulate them?

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator from Texas and others entertain that view; but suppose we assume that it is for the purpose of preventing monopolies. There has not been a monopoly formed in this country, that I know of, since the Tobacco case. After the rendition of the Standard Oil decision and the Tobacco decision there seems to have been a belief that there was no conceivable form of the organization of a monopoly which was not inhibited. I do not know of any monopolies now being formed. Our task is to rid the industrial world of those long ago illegally formed, and you can not do it by orders of a commission. You can not kill cancer with cologne water.

We know that prior to the rendition of the decision in the Northern Securities case they conceived that they could escape through securing authority from a State corporation and proceeding. They found they could not do that. Then they conceived that they could escape by the method in which the Tobacco Trust was organized. It was said at the time the Tobacco Trust was before the court that if that method of taking in and completely absorbing different corporations and covering them all by bonds and interlocking issues of stocks, and so forth—which would have the effect of making them one corporation, the contention being that it was a natural growth—did not escape the law, there would be no escape from the Sherman antitrust law; that the keenest and the ablest advisers would have exhausted all methods and all means of getting from under that statute. I have here a statement by a gentleman at one of the famous Gary dinners, in which he said that they were waiting with bated breath for the decision of the Tobacco case. When the Tobacco decision came and the court said, "This organization is subject to the law," and further said that there is no conceivable form of monopoly which can not be reached by it—that no subtlety, no device, no covering up, no misnomer of different acts can cover up such a proposition—from that hour I do not know of the organization of or the attempt to organize a great monopoly in this country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Referring to the prophecy ventured just a moment ago by the Senator from Idaho——

Mr. BORAH. I would rather be known as a Senator than as a prophet, but I will take a chance in this instance.

Mr. WALSH. Let me refer to the fact that in the late decision of the circuit court for the eighth circuit in the Harvester Trust case it was declared by one of the judges that the proof exonerated the corporation from the charges of unfair practices in the conduct of its business. I do not venture to say whether that remark was justified or not, but I should like to have the Senator assume, for the purposes of the discussion, that it is true. Only about 60 days ago I was myself engaged—being relieved from my duties here for about two weeks—in prosecuting one of the aggregations charged to be in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. I sought diligently to get proof, in order to make out my case against the combination, of unfair practices in trade, of abuses such as are often introduced in these causes for the purpose of establishing monopoly or an attempt to establish a monopoly, and I was unable to do so. Yet it is a great, big combination of a large number of corporations which are consolidated into one, and, in my estimation, like the International Harvester Co., a combination in violation of the first section of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Now, let us take the International Harvester Co. and assume that it never has been guilty of any of these improper practices.

Mr. BORAH. Of course we must only assume that.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; certainly. Let us assume that for the purposes of this discussion. The Federal Trade Commission would not reach that institution at all, would it? And is the Senator of the belief that it would be allowed to exist after the passage of this bill?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is precisely the argument of those who want a commission—that it should be permitted to exist unless it does some specific oppressive act.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I agree that it is the argument of some people who want a commission, but not the people responsible for this bill.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am perfectly willing to concede that. I have no doubt that the object of the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Texas is the same that I have, and that we all desire to accomplish the same thing. I can not too often repeat that I do not want to be understood in any other way. It is a difference of view as to what will be the effect of our action. Now, what I say is that this is the first step in the direction that those desire to go who believe that such combinations as the Harvester Trust ought to be let alone unless they commit some particular, notorious, offensive act.

Mr. WALSH. But, Mr. President, leaving the views of those distinguished gentlemen out of the case, I put the question to the Senator as to whether he believes that should we pass this legislation there would be no more suits for the dissolution of such organizations as the International Harvester Co. and the one to which I referred, with the prosecution of which I was connected?

Mr. BORAH. There would be more if I had anything to do with it, but I do not expect to have much to do with it. I have no doubt, if the Senator will permit me to say so, that if a certain school of thought should get control of the Government and this commission it would undertake to satisfy the public that the commission was doing all that ought to be done in regard to the matter, and it would have the commission as a basis upon which to begin its propaganda. Not only that, but the Senator from Montana understands that this being the first step, the second step—already attempted to be taken and thoroughly presented to the country in different ways—is that these concerns should be let alone and that the whole business should be relegated and left to a commission.

The objection I have is this: Here is a law which you say is in aid of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and yet you make it in aid of the Trade Commission act. This law could be very justly entitled "An act in aid of the Trade Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Interstate Commerce Commission."

Yielding to that principle, which is that all these things should be finally disposed of by that commission, you now prohibit tying contracts to a certain extent. Why? If it is an evil—and I think it is—why not make the offender punishable for it? You prohibit certain other specific acts, but you yield to the principle of those who say that the ultimate act shall be only admonished or prohibited and that the parties shall not be punished. You bring yourself completely within the line of procedure and the line of conduct of those who say that the Harvester Trust should be left undisturbed, because, instead of making those specific acts punishable—which is in harmony with the Sherman antitrust law—you make them nonpunishable, and render them simply subject to an admonition, which is in harmony with their principles. So, step by step, and as the public opinion shall be molded, we will more and more come to ignore the principle of the Sherman antitrust law—that is, punishment for these acts—and more and more to accept a mere admonition or an order to prevent the acts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Idaho will remember that both of those sections were absolutely taken out of the bill as it passed the Senate and were only put back through the insistence of the House conferees. My own judgment about the matter is that it is incongruous here; but, as has been suggested before, we can not always have the legislation just exactly as we want it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I said in the beginning that I had no criticism of the conference committee so far as the details of its transactions are concerned. My objection is fundamental. I am opposed to the proposition as a whole, because I think it is yielding to a policy to which I am unalterably opposed. Perhaps, technically speaking, the conference committee did what it should have done with reference to dropping some of these things. I am not going to discuss that question; others have discussed it, and they have their view about it. I have tried to make myself plain as to the fact that that is not the feature of this situation which is disturbing me. I simply want to put myself, once and for all, against the propaganda of the regulation of monopoly and against yielding upon the most stringent enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law and against putting anything covered by the Sherman antitrust law into a separate statute and putting that under the trade commission. I am against that entire policy; and for that reason I look upon this bill as unfortunate, because I can not see it in any other light than as going in that direction.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Idaho to mean that the Federal Trade Commission should not have been created under the law, but that, if there were any hiatus or any monopoly that the Sherman law did not cover, then there should have been put on the statute books legislation covering it and a resort had to the courts?

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator states, in a measure, my position; but I can state my position in language far better than I am capable of using by reading the following:

> The business of the country awaits also, has long awaited and has suffered because it could not obtain, further and more explicit legislative definition of the policy and meaning of the existing antitrust law. Nothing hampers business like uncertainty. Nothing daunts or discourages it like the necessity to take chances, to run the risk of failing under the condemnation of the law before it can make sure just what the law is. Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed. These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

A bill formed upon that principle would have received my vote and my support without any qualification whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, from whom is the Senator quoting?

Mr. BORAH. I am quoting from the President's message on the trust question.

Mr. President, I can not conceive that the principle announced by the President has been complied with. The President says that there are certain practices which are "now abundantly disclosed." How? Why, by the decisions of the Supreme Court, which have covered this vast field of activity, and have singled them out, and said that this, that, and the other means by which monopolies are built up are in contravention of the principles of the Sherman law. But the President says that the general principle may be made more certain and more available to honest business by individualizing the practice, as it were, and putting it in a separate statute. Now, you did that with one or two propositions, and did properly in doing so, but he says:

> The law itself and the penalty being made equally plain.

One of the addresses which first introduced the President of the United States to the public in so pronounced a way was his address, I think made in the State of Kentucky a number of years ago, in which he argued for the individual responsibility and the individual punishment of those who should violate the principles contained in the Sherman antitrust law. Now, that is not this bill. There is no punishment prescribed here for those who violate the principles of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I invite the attention of the Senator from Idaho to old section 12 of this bill. It visits the guilt of the corporation upon the individuals who authorized, ordered, or performed any of the acts.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I had not observed that section. I may discuss it in a few moments; but that is not a matter which I conceive to be one of the principles which have been individualized out of the Sherman antitrust law, like section 2, and the tying-contract section, and the other section. There is a punishment in regard to that, I believe. That is true.

Here is an illustration of what I was contending for. I read section 2:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States—

One of the most brutal and unconscionable methods by which the Standard Oil Co. built up its vast monopoly was discrimination as to prices in a given locality, and keeping up their prices in all other localities until their little competitor was driven into bankruptcy. That is a practice so vicious, so indefensible, and so often and constantly used by the unconscionable persons who are building up these monopolies, that no honest man would defend it, and no man of ordinary intelligence would have any doubt about what he was doing when he was doing it. It is not anything about which there is any uncertainty, either in law or in morals. Now, what do we do in regard to it?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. BORAH. In just a minute. What do we do? We say—

> Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

And then the matter is referred for enforcement, as I understand, to the Trade Commission.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Of course when the Senator puts that side of the question there is no answer to make to it; it is a basely criminal act; one destructive of the very best interests of the public. And yet if the Senator has endeavored to write a statute, as I have, to reach the case, which will not utterly destroy business operations that are entirely legitimate, he will find the task not a simple one at all; nor is it easy. I undertake to say, for any man to write a statute that would not carry evil results in many cases. Just take the reverse of it. Assume now the case of a feeble competitor of the great Standard Oil Co. It wants to introduce its product into a certain town where that organization now has a monopoly. It offers a special inducement to a man there. It says, "I will sell you the stuff at such and such a price." Outside of that it maintains its regular prices. It does so merely that it may exist against this awful monopoly. Yet you would prohibit that and you would make it penal for any competitor thus to cut prices?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course up to a certain limit that smaller corporation might be justified, but we are seeking to permit a corporation to do an act which if the monopoly did not exist it would be unfair and improper for it to do. The Senator defends it, I understand, because they are contending against a great monopoly. Mr. President, there is one complete answer to that proposition, as it seems to me, and it is the one for which I contend, and that is the destruction of that monopoly, and then establish a rule of conduct for honest men and for men who are not monopolists.

Mr. WALSH. I agree fully with the Senator, but the point I am making now is that you argue it ought to be made criminal because of the practices of this great monopoly. Now, if you consider that that great monopoly is eliminated, then it is a very simple proposition: we do not need the statute at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say it, that is one thing that we never can do—that is, legislate so that the same statute will apply to a monopolist and one who is not a monopolist; we must get rid of the monopoly.

Mr. WALSH. Rather, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, we can get rid of that monopoly, but we want to prevent, if we can, other monopolies from developing by exactly the same process.

Mr. BORAH. In order to prevent other monopolies all you have to do is to establish a universal rule as to everybody, and enforce it. If you get rid of the monopoly you want to fight by means of this method of lowering, then there is no occasion for any man to charge a lower price in one community than he does in another. So the thing to do is to get out of our commercial existence these monopolies which necessitate us to have a government by men instead of a government by law. You can not have a government by law in a republic where these monopolies exist.

Mr. WALSH. Let me remark, Mr. President, that the Senator has not reached the difficulty yet. I want him to assume the case of an organization that is not a monopoly but is a great, powerful institution, and its competitor is a feeble little organization just beginning. That is the condition I want the Senator to consider.

Mr. BORAH. As a practical proposition, of course it would be utterly useless for a small corporation to enter upon a contest with the Standard Oil Co. to lower its price in a town in order to gain some advantage. The Standard Oil Co. could say to the corporation, "Take this proposition for the present," until it got large enough to invite attention to it, and then it could lower its prices in the entire territory over which the small corporation attempted to operate, and put it out of existence.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, under those circumstances would the small corporation lowering its prices in a commercial war with the Standard Oil Co. ever get big enough to excite any such hostility on the part of the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. BORAH. I think not likely. It would likely think de minimis lex or something of that kind.

If the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] wants to move an executive session, I will not interfere.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 30 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 13811) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the following telegram from the Oil and Gas Producers' Association of West Virginia, remonstrating against the proposed tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., September 28, 1914.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Oil and Gas Producers' Association of West Virginia, in convention assembled, hereby protest against the tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline provided by the revenue bill as exorbitant and unfair in that said tax at 2 cents per gallon is 25 per cent on the present wholesale price of gasoline. If taxed at all, it should not be over one-fourth cent per gallon, and then only on gasoline marketed and sold. The provisions of section 3 of the bill as drawn now would not, in our judgment, be fair, because it does not apply on gasoline in storage, which gasoline would escape taxation. We are informed that there is at this time sufficient gasoline in storage to cover requirements during the period of taxation.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION OF WEST VIRGINIA,
By W. W. WALKER, Vice President.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the Clearing House Association of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PITTMAN presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Clearing House Association of Reno; from the Washoe County Bank of Reno; and from the First National Bank of Lovelocks, all in the State of Nevada, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from A. E. Kimball, president of the Nevada Bankers' Association, of Elko, Nev.; from the Clearing House Association of Reno, Nev.; and from George M. Reynolds, president of the Continental and Commercial National Bank, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the adoption of the provisions in the so-called Clayton antitrust bill as to interlocking of bank directorates, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARREN. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the president of the Wyoming Bankers' Association, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

RAWLINS, WYO., September 25, 1914.

Senator F. E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

The Wyoming Bankers' Association urge that you file a protest with the House Ways and Means Committee against the injustice of the Underwood bill taxing banks $2 a thousand upon capital and undivided profits, because it singles out one class of corporations alike, and therefore it is unfair and discriminatory. The banks are willing to assume their fair share of the burden, and it is urgent that the provision be readjusted so that the amount of revenue estimated to be derived from bank capital be raised by proportionate assessments upon all classes of corporations, including banks. Immediate protest by this association through you is urgent.

WYOMING BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
J. M. RUMSEY, President.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

Mr. WALSH. There is on the calendar a bill (S. 4425) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, being Order of Business 318. The Senate passed the House bill a few days ago, and I ask that the Senate bill be taken from the calendar and postponed indefinitely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 6553) granting an increase of pension to George Schmidt (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 6554) granting an increase of pension to Wilhelmina Myer (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 6555) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Duchesne, Utah; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. LEA of Tennessee:

A bill (S. 6556) to amend an act approved February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended by an act approved June 29, 1906, and all other amendatory acts; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 190) authorizing the Secretary of War to use any allotment made under the provision of H. R. 13811, Sixty-third Congress, second session, for the improvement of East River and Hell Gate, N. Y.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. STONE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 191) to convey appreciation of Congress to their excellencies Señor Domicio da Gama, Señor Rómulo S. Naón, and Señor Eduardo Suárez for their generous and distinguished services as mediators in the controversy between the Government of the United States and the leaders of the warring parties in Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted seven amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WARREN, it was Ordered, That authority be, and is hereby, granted to withdraw the papers filed in support of Senate bill No. 2016, Sixty-second Congress, first session, for the relief of Fred C. and C. Helen Fisher, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on September 29, 1914, approved and signed the following act:

S. 4274. An act to authorize and require an extension of the street railway lines of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and for other purposes.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Wednesday, September 30, 1914) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, October 1, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 30, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit whose life-giving rays permeate all space and whose love reaches out to all mankind, we thank Thee for the strong, intelligent, ever-growing faith which recognizes Thee as Father of all souls, enhances, dignifies, and ennobles life, takes away the fear of death, fills the heart with eternal hope, accentuates the sinfulness of sin, and inspires to holy living. Grant, O most merciful Father, that it may continue to grow, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial from the Washington Herald, and comment thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RESIGNATION OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., September 30, 1914.

The Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inform you that I have tendered to the governor of Maryland my resignation as a Representative in the Sixty-third Congress of the United States from the first congressional district of Maryland, to take effect on this date.

Very respectfully,
J. HARRY COVINGTON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the morning papers have the statement that the House is expected to take a recess or adjourn early next week. I think it is only fair to the House and the country to say that, as the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I have been authorized to report a rule on the ship-purchase bill and instructed to present that rule immediately after the completion of the Philippine legislation. In my last conference with the President, which I think is perfectly fair for me to state to the House, he insisted that he was very anxious for this bill to be taken up for consideration, and urged me to call the Committee on Rules together at the earliest practicable date, which was done; and they acted on the special rule. That special rule is now in my hand, and just as soon as the Philippine legislation is out of the way, I desire to inform the House I shall present the special rule to take up for consideration the ship-purchase bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. For immediate consideration?

Mr. MANN. For this evidence of Democratic harmony we are truly thankful.

Mr. HENRY. It is harmony. There is no trouble about it.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union automatically——

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, before we proceed I would like to extend my remarks in the RECORD by adding a few more words.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject about which he was speaking. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understood the gentleman asked leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of whether we were going to have the shipping bill or not. We are all much interested in the subject of whether we get away or not. Why can not the gentleman give us the information instead of making us read it at some future time in the RECORD?

Mr. HENRY. The information bears upon the pending legislation, and I have prepared a statement for the RECORD, and it will throw light on the very subject the gentleman asks about.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we are entitled to that information now.

Mr. HENRY. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. I know, but the gentleman only had two minutes and he used that up.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have five minutes in which to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read the statement that I have prepared.

The Clerk read as follows:

"We should not think of adjourning Congress at this crisis. In the first place, only yesterday the southern governors, many Senators and Representatives resolutely determined in a historic conference in the Senate Office Building to 'make every possible effort to secure Federal legislation which will enable the producers of cotton to obtain loans of public funds to be deposited in banks at a reasonable rate of interest to be fixed by the Government,' and so forth.

"Hence, southern Senators and Representatives must keep faith and make a determined fight for this legislation. If they do not, they can not go home and look their people in the face with the cotton industry, our great international product, utterly prostrated and the market completely paralyzed.

"Second. We should pass the ship-purchase bill. This is one of the most far-reaching, beneficial, and glorious measures yet proposed by the President. It will rescue our commerce, manufactures, and agricultural exports from the most merciless, cruel, and grinding shipping trust and monopoly on the high seas the world ever saw. By the prompt establishment of this merchant marine it will bring countless blessings and benefits to our export manufactures, products of the field and farm, and commerce in general, by breaking the strangle hold of the piratical masters of the sea, who dominate rates on the high seas throughout the universe by their 'conferences,' agreements, and conspiracies to monopolize in freight charges.

"Third. We should pass the three important bills reported by the House Committee on Banking and Currency and passed by the Senate, to wit, S. 6398, S. 6505, and H. R. 15038, so that the Federal reserve act may be speedily put in operation for the benefit of business and the relief of the distressed people throughout the South.

"Fourth. We should speedily pass the boiler-inspection bill, H. R. 17894, an emergency measure, and thus save thousands of lives on the railroads. This bill has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Rules Committee has authorized a special rule for its consideration.

"There are some other important matters that should be passed. These things are of more importance to the masses of people than the political fortunes of a few men or any set of men.

"Therefore, I shall resist adjournment until these matters are disposed of and fight to the death for action that will relieve the suffering and sorely distressed people of the cotton-growing States, which constitute about one-third the area and population of the Union."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask what this rule for the consideration of the shipping bill provides as to the debate, and so forth?

Mr. HENRY. Of course, we can not take it up now. It is authorized to be reported. It provides for eight hours' general debate and for unlimited right of amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HENRY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us when the boiler-inspection bill was passed? Was not that passed 10 years ago?

Mr. HENRY. This is extending the act.

Mr. MADDEN. This is extending it?

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman is on a cold trail about that. It is a very important measure.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman seems to be on quite a hot trail.

Mr. HENRY. I think not. Just the usual procedure as to the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the shipping bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the shipping bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Chair puts the question. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to make that seven minutes in order that I may yield five minutes of the time to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON], who has a message not political and in which we may all be interested.

Mr. MADDEN. I might ask to make it 10, so that I may have 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. How is the gentleman going to yield the time of the gentleman from Illinois? He asked two minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. BARNHART. I asked it in order that he might yield it to Mr. COVINGTON.

The SPEAKER. He can not yield it to Mr. COVINGTON.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Wait a moment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, all I desire to do is to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] whether he is prepared this morning to make any statement to the House on the probability of adjournment or taking any other procedure by which Members may shortly go home?

Mr. HENRY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Was the gentleman addressing his remarks to me?

Mr. MANN. I was not. I was addressing the old leader of the majority side of the House.

Mr. HENRY. I disclaim any right to leadership.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the House will permit me, I will answer the gentleman's question. I would like to make a pact, if it is possible, that would let the House get away for a few weeks before election. So far as I am concerned, I would be glad to do so; but the gentleman from Illinois understands, of course, that a pact of that kind can only be made by unanimous consent, and until this side of the House is determined to live up to a pact of that kind and that side of the House is also willing to do so there is no chance for the gentleman from Illinois and myself to make an agreement. If the time arrives in the near future when the sentiment on both sides of the aisle is prepared to enter into a pact and live up to it, so far as I am concerned I shall be very glad to live up to it.

Mr. MANN. I made the inquiry in view of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama yesterday morning, to see if anything had eventuated that would be of interest to the House to know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say candidly that if the ship bill is taken up and a rule is considered we shall probably not get away much before election, if at all. I shall be glad to support a rule on the shipping bill and support the bill; but I would be entirely willing and glad to have the rule on the shipping bill considered and the consideration of that bill go over until after election, because I think it could be delayed to that extent without any serious harm. I realize the necessity of gentlemen on both sides of the House going to their districts, if possible, but I do not think the situation is such that we can make an agreement now; but I hope that maybe the situation will clear itself up in a few days, and if it does I shall be glad to endeavor to make a pact with the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. METZ, Mr. HENRY, and Mr. ADAMSON rose.

IMPORTATION OF CHEMICALS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ] is recognized.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to state the condition of the international chemical situation to-day for the benefit of those who are interested, so that they may inform their constituents from whom they get inquiries, and there are a lot of them.

The German Government has consented to give us all the chemicals we need of every kind, except that they have put an embargo on raw materials for dyestuff making. They impose two conditions: First, that we shall guarantee not to furnish these chemicals to any nation with which they are at war; and, second, that we shall transport them in American vessels.

That is, they do not want to take the risk of shipping these goods with the idea that they are for America and then have them exported to other countries. They promise that we shall get them if we send over American vessels in which to transport them.

Such vessels can be had and sent over, and in that way our mills can be kept supplied with the necessary chemicals, and we can get all we need from Germany. Under these conditions, if we send American vessels to Rotterdam, the vessels can be loaded and the chemicals and dyes brought here.

There is to be a conference at the State Department at 3 o'clock this afternoon for the purpose of taking up this question with the representatives of the textile, mining, and agricultural interests.

There have been a lot of reports, scattered around by people who do not know anything about the matter, as to the manufacturers who can make these goods here and the Swiss manufacturers. But the fact remains that we, as well as the Swiss, English, and French manufacturers, must all get our raw materials from Germany, and whether or not we shall ever be able to make these goods here is academic, in view of the fact that we want them now to keep our mills going.

We want Germany's chemicals and Germany wants our cotton, and it is up to us to get it there.

The conference, held at the office of the Secretary of the Interior on September 3, resulted in a memorandum being issued, which I offer herewith, together with my suggestions thereon:

MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
September 3, 1914.

Two definite suggestions were made at the conference held by Secretary Lane to-day with about 25 representatives of the leading manufacturers of coal-tar, chemical, and pharmaceutical products:

First. That there should be a system instituted in this country similar to the one in England, whereby if a foreign patent is not used and manufactured within a reasonable time it will be opened to use by American manufacturers.

Second. A law should be passed whereby unfair competition will be cut off. This relates to the practice known as "dumping." This would preclude the practice, which it is alleged is now followed, of selling foreign products below the costs of manufacture.

It was pointed out that on account of foreign monopoly, aspirin, for instance, sells in this country for 32 cents an ounce, whereas abroad it sells for 42 cents per pound.

The statement was also made that about 20 per cent of the aniline dyes used in the United States are produced here, but from intermediate material, which is largely imported, although we have an abundant supply of coal tar; that there is only about a three-months' supply of dyestuffs in this country; and that the manufacturers in Germany have a supply on hand that would last this country for about a year if it could be procured; that most of the processes for the manufacture of dyestuffs are open to use in this country, but German patents preclude the manufacture here of many medicinal preparations; that many of these patents are being used as they expire; that products covered by foreign patents which have now expired are selling by the pound for what they sold by the ounce before the expiration of the patents.

It was thought by all the representatives of the manufacturers present that it was not profitable to go into the business, for the reason that a demand could not be secured for a sufficient amount of American dyestuffs with open foreign competition. The textile representatives stated that this was due to the fact that they could purchase dyestuffs manufactured abroad cheaper than they could purchase the same material in America. Secretary Lane asked if it was not possible to secure capital to invest in manufacturing plants if the users of dyestuffs would get together and give the manufacturers sufficient business. This was answered by the statement that it was impracticable and even impossible to get the users of dyestuffs to enter into such an agreement on account of the change of styles, the different materials required, and the uncertainty of demand, which would preclude the placing of orders for a period of several years.

The Secretary was requested to use his efforts through the State Department to secure permission for the exportation of dyestuffs from Germany on condition that the moneys needed were furnished. One of the far-reaching suggestions of the conference was that the wisest way to develop a great coal-tar product industry in the United States as exists in Germany was for the Government to establish a Government plant whose primary purpose should be the making of nitroderivatives of coal tar and other materials needed for explosives by the War and Navy Departments. This plant could experiment in processes which would become public property and be the foundation for private enterprise. The startling statement was made that the United States to-day was absolutely dependent on Germany for some of the essential elements in smokeless powder, and that if Germany stopped their manufacture or prohibited export to this country we would be helpless. In time of war we could not supply our own war materials, even though the very raw materials from which they come were exported from the United States.

NEW YORK, September 26, 1914.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Referring to my recent call on you, and the conference with the manufacturers of coal-tar chemical and pharmaceutical products had at your office, permit me, in order to add to the record, to make the following remarks upon the memorandum, dated September 3, which your department issued and of which you gave me a copy.

First. In regard to the English system compelling the working of a patent, Germany provides in her patent law that a patent must be worked, but an exception is made in the case of American patents, and this exception was made at the request of the United States and is the subject of a treaty with Germany. There are so many more American patents, on machinery especially, taken out by Americans in Germany that the preponderance of interest is entirely on the side of the United States in not having the working clause enforced. England has such a working clause, which resulted, so far as chemicals and dyestuffs are concerned, in compelling large German plants—at least two of them—to erect plants in England in which the essential features of the patents are carried out; small quantities of the goods are made, but in all cases from raw material obtained from Germany from the original plants of the patentees. These patents, of course, are owned by English companies under the English law, but it is fair to assume that the stock control is in the German plants, either directly or indirectly.

Since the war broke out I have had telegrams from England and letters from the managers of these plants stating that they were compelled to shut down for lack of raw material, and asking if we could supply them from the United States either with the finished products or with the raw materials necessary to run their plants. England, in spite of its patent law, is therefore in a worse position than the United States, so far as these products are concerned. There are comparatively few of them, but they are very essential in various industries and also for the public health.

Second. "Unfair competition" is a general statement that covers largely the excuse of the man who is not able to compete. There is no "dumping" of German products, so far as chemical products are concerned, in the United States, because we are compelled to pay duty upon the "market value abroad," and the customhouse very soon raises invoices that do not come up to the market value, and a penalty falls upon the importer. Importers are not selling goods at a loss simply to dispose of the surplus stock of Germany, and even if such a condition did exist, no one knows better than the makers of the dyestuffs themselves, who, besides manufacturing a limited amount of colors in this country from raw materials imported from abroad, import very largely the finished product, that undervaluation or "dumping" is entirely out of the question and that none of the foreign manufacturers are selling their products below cost of manufacture. These domestic manufacturers have a 30 per cent protection under the present tariff. They haven't had less than that in 30 years. Under the Payne bill they succeeded in having a large number of intermediate products and raw materials, which formerly paid 20 per cent, placed upon the free list. These intermediate products or raw materials are really the basis of an industry, and upon them depends the development of the color industry in the United States.

Under the Underwood tariff most of these intermediate products or raw materials were put back on the dutiable list, with duties varying from 10 per cent to 20 per cent, for the very purpose of encouraging the production of benzole and the intermediate products derived therefrom. Practically nothing has been done, but aniline oil, betanaphthol, and some other products which were formerly free and are now paying duty are being sold in the markets of the world, not only in the United States but everywhere else, below the price at which they were sold before these duties went into effect, and the manufacturers abroad are not complaining about doing business at a loss on them even at the present time.

It was pointed out that on account of patent restriction "aspirin, for instance, sells in this country for 32 cents an ounce, whereas abroad it sells for 42 cents per pound." This is a shining example of conditions just exactly as they exist, because, in the first place, aspirin is covered by an American patent; the patent is owned by an American company and is practically the only one of all the coal-tar medicinal products, excepting phenacetine and acetanilid, that is made in the United States. It is made in Albany, at the plant of the Hudson River Aniline Co., which is in close affiliation if not actually controlled by the Farbenfabriken vorm. Friedrich Bayer & Co., of Germany, the original patentees of phenacetine and aspirin. The duty on aspirin is 25 per cent, and since the patents abroad expired there have been constant suits for patent infringement on stuff brought in in violation of the American patent. A patent is a monopoly granted for the product patented, and the American manufacturers have spent and are spending thousands and thousands of dollars protecting their rights against the infringing product from abroad. Therefore, quoting aspirin is entirely wide of the mark, has no bearing on the case whatever, for it is essentially a product patented in America, owned by an American company, and being manufactured by an American factory in Albany, N. Y. Practically the only product of this group on which the price was raised when the war began was aspirin. None of the German proprietary products were raised or have been raised up to the present time more than to simply cover the extra cost of transportation and war risk.

Aspirin was advanced 50 per cent because salicylic acid, from which it is made, went up 100 per cent in price; and when the supply in hand is exhausted no more can be produced, because it is made from crystal carbolic acid produced only in England and Germany. It is contraband of war and under embargo in both countries against exportation. The result will be that the aspirin people will have to get their supplies from Germany instead of making it here if it is to continue in this market.

The statement that "20 per cent of aniline dyes used in the United States are made here" may be correct if the volume in pounds and not in values is considered, and only aniline colors as such and no alizarines nor the derivatives of anthracene or alizarine, indigo, and other coal-tar colors are considered.

The betanaphthol, paranitraniline, and similar intermediate products also used directly by the textile mills for producing color on the fiber must be eliminated in such a calculation. It covers mainly nigrosines used for leather and for shoe blacking in large quantities, soluble blues, magenta, and a few products used largely by the paper mills, alkali blues and eosines used in paints and inks, all of which are the simplest of aniline colors to produce, but it is possible to make them only because of the free raw materials or the low rate of duty thereon and the 30 per cent protection on the finished product. Undoubtedly many products, after the patent expires, are sold by the pound at a price that formerly ruled for the ounce. This is not unusual for goods made in Germany only, but it can be truthfully stated of goods made anywhere else, including even the United States. That is how the inventor and patentee reimburses himself for the outlay, trouble, and study which the invention caused him and which every Government realizes under its patent law that he shall be entitled to the benefit of for a certain number of years in return for acquainting the world at large with the method of carrying out his invention. The fundamental product, of course, after all, in the discussion of coal-tar chemicals and dyestuffs is benzole, which is produced here by the Coal Tar Products Co. and the Barrett Manufacturing Co., who are in close affiliation. I have been told by their representatives that it would take them from 18 months to 2 years to construct plants to increase their supply of benzole. They produce enough now to take care of our present requirements on this side and produce just enough aniline oil, the next stage in the process of color making, to meet their contracts now in force, and no more. The German Government had given permission to export dyestuffs. They were coming in freely until it was ascertained that some of them were reexported to Canada and England, and I have a strong suspicion and reason to believe that one of the gentlemen most active in the conference held in your office had agreed to act as a go-between for Canadian manufacturers desirous of obtaining German dyestuffs to keep their mills going. Undoubtedly these manufacturers will see to it that the English mills with which they are affiliated will also get the necessary supplies if they can be obtained in this way. But there are much graver conditions in this situation than simply the dyestuff industry, although that is far-reaching.

The production of cyanides—largely used by mining interests, the potash used for fertilizers, etc.—are all controlled practically by Germany. These goods could have all been shipped to us down the Rhine, via Rotterdam, by steamers of the Holland-American Line, and a quantity of colors sufficient to run the country for another four to six weeks has come in in that way since the war began. There were rumors, however, that England would seize these supplies and keep them for herself, even though she had to pay for them in a prize court. Whether or not these remarks had effect upon the situation, the German Government a few days ago placed an embargo on all chemicals of every nature and description unless they could be transported to the United States in American vessels under the American flag. As soon as such vessels are provided we can get all we need, and not only dyestuffs but cyanide and potash as well may be exported to this country.

There is to be a conference on Wednesday at the State Department in regard to this matter, and undoubtedly steps will be taken to furnish American bottoms to bring these much-needed products into this country. Incidentally, it may be well to call attention to the fact also that the exportation of all raw materials and intermediate products that can be used for color making has been absolutely prohibited by the German Government, undoubtedly for fear that these products might find their way back to England and thus help supply the English textile industry.

I realize, of course, we have no interest in the industries of England, Germany, or any other country excepting our own. There is no reason why we can not keep our own supplied if we do not pay too much attention to the few who want to take advantage of this crisis to further their own lines at the sacrifice of thousands and thousands of mills and other consumers who need the products, and upon obtaining which the prosperity of this country so largely depends.

Just one point more: If all these things can be brought about, if we could compel the carrying out of patents in this country, if we could compel manufacturing here, the result would be the same as in England. The large German plants with their experience would simply duplicate their own plants here on a small scale, just enough to comply with the law, and would make the American consumer pay for the amortization of these plants during the life of the patent, and the first time trouble arose we would be in the same position we are now, because no one would make raw materials and products not patented on a losing basis in competition with those who could beat them at least 100 per cent at any time.

The labor involved in chemical industry is very small. It is the smallest item of all, so we would not gain much for "labor" by establishing chemical plants in this country. There are a great many more men employed in the merchandising of chemicals than there are in making them, and always will be.

Yours, very truly,

HERMAN A. METZ.

ADDRESS OF JUDGE COVINGTON.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House hear the gentleman from Maryland, Judge COVINGTON, for five minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COVINGTON] may address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COVINGTON. Mr. Speaker, as the letter of resignation read a few moments ago from the Clerk's desk indicates, this is the last day of my service in the House of Representatives. I would have been quite content modestly to retire without uttering a single word at the time of my departure if I did not feel so deep a sense of gratitude, which I now desire briefly to express, for the very generous and more than merited praise which my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber have expressed for me and my work on this floor. The genuineness and warmth of those expressions have deeply touched me, and I shall always cherish them as of my brightest memories.

Mr. Speaker, I leave this body with a great sense of humbleness, because I have come to realize what service in it really means. We know theoretically about the great coordinate branches of the Federal Government. We know that its Legislature contains another body at the opposite end of the Capitol, but we also know that Anglo-Saxon liberty has always had its bulwark in the great popular assembly of the whole people. From the time when the great charter was wrested from King John on the green field of Runnymede, the progress of English liberty has simply kept pace with the increasing power of the House of Commons. Here in the United States, from the day of the Articles of Confederation to the present time, the basic structure of our institutions has been our popular assembly. The Senate is a great body, with certain high constitutional prerogatives, but its incorporation in the Constitution as a section of our National Legislature was the result of compromise made essential by the conditions surrounding the framers of the Constitution. In a time of great popular upheaval it might be abolished and the solid framework of our Government would remain unimpaired. The title and the constitutional prerogatives of our Chief Magistrate might be altered; the organization of our judicial system might be radically reconstructed without the constitutional liberty of the American people being in the slightest infringed upon. But you can never change the essential form or lessen the power of the House of Representatives and maintain unimpaired the freedom and happiness of our people. This Government in its majesty, with the Stars and Stripes as its glorious emblem of blood-bought liberty, will stand as a monument and guide to freedom in the world just so long as the House, in its full constitutional power of to-day, with each individual Member therein representative of and responsible to a great constituency of citizens, remains the keystone of the Government.

And so in leaving I can not say that I regard it as a promotion to go from the House of Representatives to the Federal bench. The legislature and the bench are fields apart in our coordinate scheme of government, and men will constantly go from one to the other of them; but no man, in assuming an appointive judicial position, no matter how high, can fairly say that he has been promoted from the post he has thrice occupied in this House as the representative by their suffrages of 200,000 freemen.

Mr. Speaker, in departing from these seats of the mighty—for it is a mighty place—the happiest thought one can have, the greatest source of gratification, is the thought that he will be able truthfully to tell his fellow citizens that there is much less of narrow and offensive partisanship and a great deal more of lofty patriotism among the Members of this House than the public are wont to believe. Ours is a government by political parties. They were really first organized of necessity in this country in the Congress. Citizens differ in opinion as to what is best for the States, and a political party is the organism which, with straightforward and unquestionable power, with fixed purpose and the collective force of masses of the people, can make effective the primary opinions upon which certain masses agree. But at any critical moment in the Nation's history in this House it may well be said, "There none were for the party and all were for the State."

It has been glorious to know the broad catholicity of the Members of this House. Friendships do not follow party lines, and I shall always remember most gratefully the cordial fellowship which I have had with the members of the party to which I am opposed as well as with my own political associates.

Mr. Speaker, I observed a few days ago that the genial gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] was engaged in the pastime of making a presidential candidate for 1916. I imagine that, belonging to the party to which he does, he was engaged in a chimerical performance, perhaps trying to extract sunbeams from political snowballs. But, seriously, Mr. Speaker, if by some strange revolution of politics the now minority party shall have even a chance to elect a President, I know of no one of its members so fit as the great minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Whatever of good record his party has before the people to-day is due to his industry and keen political acumen in this House. His party will honor itself in honoring him with the nomination for the Presidency. [Applause.] Of course, I hope it will be only an empty honor, but an honor well deserved nevertheless.

As a parting word, I thank the Members of this House from the depths of my heart for the constant courtesy and consideration they have accorded me since the day I first came here, and I leave this Chamber and its inspiring associations with genuine regret. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 14233) to provide for the leasing of coal lands in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3550) ratifying the establishment of the boundary line between the States of Connecticut and Massachusetts.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—REVISION OF PRINTING LAWS.

The SPEAKER. This being Calendar Wednesday, the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 15902, to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications, with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of H. R. 15902, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on last Wednesday an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was pending, to strike out the paragraph relating to the method of allotting documents to Members.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, as this is probably the most important paragraph in the bill, I would like to enter into an arrangement with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], if he is present, as to time, so that we may go into this matter fully for the information of all.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has just stepped out, and is not in the Chamber at this moment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Illinois feel that he can enter into an agreement as to the time?

Mr. MANN. I expect to speak in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. I do not know who will want to be heard in favor of the motion.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate close in 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I think Members will want more time than that.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it an hour.

Mr. BARNHART. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to strike out the paragraph be closed in one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment be confined to one hour.

Mr. MANN. One-half of the time in favor, and one-half opposed.

Mr. BARNHART. One-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] or whomsoever he may designate, and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. One half the time to be used by those who favor the amendment, and the other half by those who are opposed to it.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether that agreement applies only to the first paragraph of section 68, ending with line 4, on page 77?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. It does not apply to the balance of that section?

Mr. BARNHART. No.

Mr. MANN. No; only to that paragraph.

Mr. BARNHART. Only the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if there is anyone on the other side who would now like to use any of the time?

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is not here, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is going to speak in opposition to the motion.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, for the information of those present on both sides of the House who may not have examined this paragraph carefully I want to state briefly, and as fairly and fully as I can, so that all may understand, that this is the paragraph in the bill that provides for changing the present method of allotting documents to Members of Congress, substituting a valuation plan for the present system. That is, instead of allotting all sorts of documents to each Member of Congress hereafter, if the provisions of this bill are adopted, an allotment, not in money but in publications, will be given to each Member, and he may draw against that valuation or that allotment any document which he cares to use. Furthermore——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Would that include the farmers' bulletins?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; it includes the farmers' bulletins. And in this connection I want to state briefly that not only the present Committee on Printing but several former committees who have gone before have unanimously agreed that something of this sort is really necessary to give the people of the several congressional districts of the country what they really want, and yet effect a great saving in the matter of the publication of documents. The gentleman from Illinois referred to farmers' bulletins. I want to explain in that connection that for the past 10 years the cost of the farmers' bulletins, 12,500 to each district, has been, according to the size of the publication and the number of pages, from $191 to $205 each year to each congressional district. Now, it has been discovered that many Members of Congress have not used the farmers' bulletins—that 30 Members did not draw any bulletins at all in one session of Congress, and there became an accumulation of 3,000,000 copies in the Agriculture Department, where they have lain until many have become practically obsolete. That is for the reason that scientific research has progressed since the publication of the bulletin whereby that makes such publications absolutely worthless to anyone.

The provision of the present bill is that you may have $1,800 in document value, and you may draw it all out in farmers' bulletins if you see fit, or if you do not need any bulletins in your district you can have it in horse books or cattle books or yearbooks or geological surveys and a thousand and one things set forth in the pamphlet which has been mailed to each Member of the House setting forth the wide range of publications.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the total estimated cost of the publications that are usually received during the year by a Member of Congress as compared with the basis proposed by the committee?

Mr. BARNHART. The average cost of allotment to Members has been, in the 10 years past, some $1,500 to $1,550 to each Member. This new provision will give $1,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. That $1,500 average includes the farmers' bulletins?

Mr. BARNHART. No; it does not. We have allowed $1,600 in value for the publications that you have been receiving through the folding room and added $200 to that for farmers' bulletins, which makes the total of $1,800.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I would like to inquire how the price is arrived at for the Yearbook, say? It is proposed to publish 470,000, and in the report they are figured at $1 apiece. I think they can be purchased for a good deal less than that.

Mr. BARNHART. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for asking the question. The Agricultural Yearbook under the present proposition will not carry the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture. That is really an official report. We will thereby reduce the cost of the total publication $16,000, and the reports will still be available to anybody that wants them by asking the department for them. The Yearbook has cost by actual competition anywhere from 60 cents to 97 cents. To that has been added 10 per cent, as it is on all publications, to cover the expense of wrapping, storage, and so forth, and that 10 per cent this bill proposes to remove.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has occupied five minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. I would like five minutes more. The Yearbook will cost, it has been estimated under this plan, with the elimination of the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, something like 50 cents a copy. There will be no addition of 10 per cent. The cost of the horse book will be about 40 cents a copy, and there will be a reduction, provided the size of the volume remains the same, of 10 per cent from that, which will bring it to about 36 cents a copy. The cattle book will cost about 36 cents per copy, and the farmers' bulletins cost on an average a cent and a quarter apiece, and not 5 cents, at which the Government sells them, because there is the expense of mailing, wrapping, and stationery, which in order to keep the office whole had to be added to the cost.

The prices fixed have been established so as to protect the Printing Office against loss. The committee believes, the Senate committee believes, the Joint Committee on Printing believes, and every committee that has ever investigated the abuses and every committee that has had anything to do with it, without regard to politics, believes that for the benefit of the membership of the House, for the efficiency of the service to the people whom Members serve, and for the welfare of the Public Treasury, such a provision ought to be adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the committee, states to the House that the plan proposed would give to the people in the districts throughout the country such documents as they may be interested in. My experience is that the people throughout the country are interested in all the documents. They are not interested in any particular district in a given document. Let us suppose, for example, that if the plan in this bill shall be carried out that the 30,000 school children in my district ask for a map of the United States because they know that we have a given allotment made in value, what else can I do but to respond to those requests, and what would become of the other people interested in public documents? Some people want one kind of a document, other people want another. But let us assume that any given number of children in the public schools had made up their minds that they wanted a map of the United States, and the fever for that map should spread throughout every school in the district, and that each one should request to be supplied with it.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. What do these people do now when they ask for more maps than the gentleman has to dispose of?

Mr. MADDEN. Everybody knows that each Member has an allotment of a certain number of documents of a given kind. Under the proposition of this committee everybody would be advised that a certain amount of money corresponding to the value of a certain number of documents had been placed to the credit of each Member of Congress. All anyone would have to do would be to form a combination in any given district to get a given kind of document, and a Member of Congress would be powerless to refuse to send that document as long as he had any to his credit from which to send it. That would leave him in the embarrassing position of not being able to supply the varied information of the Government activities. The women everywhere are interested in farmers' bulletins. The men are also interested in them. They want to know what recommendations the Agricultural Department makes on all the different topics studied by that department. Lots of people are interested in yearbooks. Veterinary surgeons, students at veterinary colleges, are interested in horse books and cattle books. Engineers and scientists are interested in the geological surveys. All kinds of people, thinking in all kinds of ways, want the information that fits their particular case, and to-day Members are permitted to extend to these people all privileges which the Government affords by sending them the particular documents, to the extent of their allotment, which the people request. But give notice to the public that Members are allotted a certain value in documents, and let the public come to believe that their request for a given document will be responded to, and they may take out all of your allotment in one document, and the result will be that all the rest of the people in the territory represented by a Member of Congress will have to make their requests in vain. To-day Members are able to supply the needs of the people according to their varied thoughts and their interest in Government activities, and this amendment ought not to be voted down. On the contrary, it ought to be adopted.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is a very important bill, and the section sought to be stricken out is the very vitals of the entire measure. I do not think that the amendment ought to prevail at all, and I believe it is up to every Member here to study carefully this amendment before he casts a vote upon it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who just preceded me, struck the keynote, namely, that every district, or practically every district, desires its own peculiar literature. For that very reason the amendment ought not to carry. It ought not to obtain. I am not at all afraid of an onslaught being made upon me by the people of my district demanding a certain kind of literature that will exhaust my quota. I have never yet found the people of my district unreasonable. When I have told them that I did not have books to my credit they have accepted my statement. I have scores and scores of publications to my credit that I am ready now to turn over to any Member upon the floor of the House who wants them. In the seven years that I have served in this House I think I have had but two demands for geological bulletins. Yet I have a tremendous number of them to my credit. They are down here in the folding room or some place else—I do not know where—taking up room, and they are of no use, no value to me, and there is no demand for them in my district whatever. But I happen to have an agricultural district. The demand upon me for agricultural yearbooks is tremendous, and I am unable to supply it. Seven years ago when I came to Congress I invested several dollars, merging into the early hundreds of dollars, in agricultural yearbooks. I paid that money out of my own pocket until I probably had stored away in the folding room some six or seven thousand yearbooks, going back to the year 1903. Since that period of time I have been substantially able to meet the demands of my people for agricultural yearbooks; but had I not adopted that plan, I could not have begun to supply the demand. I have a tremendous demand for agricultural bulletins. The State of Indiana two years ago enacted a law requiring agriculture to be taught in our public schools. To-day the teachers in my district are expecting thousands of farm bulletins from me, and it keeps me eternally going to Members of the House who come from cities, begging them for farm bulletins, and I have to exchange things which I have to meet that demand. I have an unprecedented demand for horse-doctor books and cattle-doctor books, and things like that. Those four things—the agricultural yearbooks, farm bulletins, the horse-doctor and the cattle-doctor books—are the four pieces of literature to which I have an unprecedented demand. So far as these large mounted maps are concerned, of course they are a nice present to send out occasionally to some one to whom you want to send something, but there is no real educational value in one of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is proper for one Member to take especial pride in any one piece of proposed legislation, but for many years I served on the Committee on Printing, and everyone knows that the work of that committee is largely a business proposition. I want to say that so far as the work of the committee extended during all of the years of my service upon it, which ended with the beginning of this Congress, politics cut small part in the deliberations of the committee. Generally speaking, the matters that came up were questions of business, and for about eight years there was a Joint Investigating Commission on Printing and a Joint Committee on Printing, as well as a Committee on Printing in both the House and the Senate. The first organization I mentioned has ceased its labors, but one of the purposes that the joint investigating commission had was to simplify the Government printing and to economize in all matters appertaining to that branch of the Government service. It has been correctly stated here by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], the chairman of the present Committee on Printing in the House, that it has been the unanimous opinion and finding of all those who have investigated the question of public printing, appointed of the House and Senate, that the old system of publishing so many thousands or hundreds of thousands of documents and then distributing those documents without regard to the subjects among the membership of the House and of the Senate on a pro rata was wrong in practice. My friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who spoke a moment ago, I think presented all of the arguments against this proposition, but I would like to ask him one or two questions. I know that he is a good business man, and I know that he is a good legislator, and I pay tribute to him for that; but I would like to ask him what is the necessity of giving to the people along the banks of the lower Mississippi bulletins that would interest the people of Nevada or some great mining section? What would be the use of giving to children in a city school many of the documents and bulletins that would properly interest children in a country school, in an entirely different section of the country, and, lastly, I would ask him this: Is it true that the school children of this country read and study all of the farm bulletins as textbooks in the public schools of this country? I know that they do not. I do know this, that occasionally a request is received from a particular school that a certain bulletin be sent to the teacher of that school or to a trustee of that school. A matter of interest contained in that bulletin it is supposed will be useful in the training and education of the children of that locality.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 11 minutes remaining and those who are favorable to the amendment have 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. BARNHART. Then I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman have charge of the time? I thought the Chair had charge of the time; but I do not care.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of economy to the Government and will save to the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. I have stated here before, and I do not care to repeat it now, that the work of the Joint Printing Investigating Commission and the Joint Committee on Printing and the Committees on Printing of the House and the Senate have saved to this Government more than a million dollars a year for years past. Now, as to distribution, a great deal has been said about the Yearbook. I have said that is a public document of such general information as to make it of large import. It is a fact that we have the same number of Yearbooks printed to-day that we had in 1895. It is also true that the membership of the House and the membership of the Senate have increased during that time, so that whereas in 1895 each Member of the House had a quota of 991 Yearbooks annually, to-day he has 812, and that is accounted for on the ground that the membership of the House has been increased so that we receive 179 less now. I may say, Mr. Chairman, what each Member here can say, that there are hundreds of public documents printed that do not interest the people I represent here on this floor. The purpose of this bill and the purpose of this provision that is under discussion here is to give to each Member of the House and Senate the publications which are of value to the people he represents. Why, only four years ago more than a million of public documents were sent to the junk heap, and I believe this year more than 900,000 copies were sent to the junk heap, because they were under the old system—because they were published under existing law. There was not a general demand for them, so they were piled up in the document room to the credit of the membership of the House and the Senate, but were not sent out to the public because the public do not want those publications. So, Mr. Chairman, I submit that one of the very wise and best provisions of this bill is that providing for the valuation and giving to the membership of the House and the Senate the right and privilege to say what particular documents they wish for the people they represent, and then they will be able to supply those on requests made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Illinois opposed to the amendment?

Mr. MANN. I am opposed to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry there are not more Members of the House present, not for the purpose of hearing me but in order that they might consider this proposition more for their own information. If it should become a law it is quite important, and if it should not the proposition is important. Under existing law there are certain publications published with an addition of a fixed number; various reports of departments, various reports of different governmental activities, and the old printing law provides for the publication of a fixed number. They are divided between the House and Senate folding rooms in addition to what we call the usual number, which goes to libraries, and so forth, and each Member of the House receives a certain number of those publications, not quite so many now, since we have increased the membership of the House, as it used to be when I first came to the House. Many of them are of no interest to the average citizen or the average Member of Congress. Most of those publications are wasted, no matter what is done with them. They are wasted if they are thrown in the wastebasket and equally wasted as a rule if they are sent to some constituent. We send out most of our publications, but very often a constituent does not feel at all flattered by receiving some technical scientific publication concerning something that he does not know the first thing about. And it may not always be practical to send to people who do know about them. We all endeavor to do the best we can in that way. Now, the proposition pending before us is to give each Member a certain credit with the Government Printing Office, and whenever any publication is published within a certain list of considerable length named in the bill that then the Member of Congress can take just as many copies of that publication as he pleases, so that he does not exceed his credit balance at the Government Printing Office. Under that a man can take Smithsonian Institution reports or American Historical Society reports, or the Yearbook of agricultural reports of such number as he pleases within his limit. Now, to-day we get the Yearbook, which is very popular and which we get in large numbers. In addition to that we get the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, which is purely statistical and practically of no interest to the average citizen, and I doubt whether many Members of Congress send them out unless they send them out thinking they are Yearbooks, which they are not, but under the system proposed as a Member examines the documents which are issued he will get his quota of those documents, fixing the number that he himself wants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois have leave to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Then we often order published a document to be placed to our credit in the folding room, like the horse book, the cow book, the cookbook some time ago, various things of that sort, and I am inclined to think that this system, if adopted, will lead to the ordering of various documents of that kind to be printed which are of interest to the people, instead of publishing a lot of documents, as we do now, that are of no interest to the people; and to me it seems the wiser plan, with the Government collecting a large amount of information, to publish the information in a form which will entertain and instruct the people whom we represent.

I understand there are some dangers in this proposition as a matter of convenience. One danger is that it will be represented that a Member of Congress receives an allowance of $1,800 in addition to his present salary and his present mileage and his present stationery account. Well, I do not think that will cut very much figure. There is another difficulty that will arise. Now, when a constituent reads in a public paper that a certain document has been issued which he can get by writing to his Member of Congress, he writes to the Member of Congress. He does not know what the document is nine times out of ten; does not want it, and has no use for it, but he thinks he can get something for nothing, and he writes for it. If a number of papers in your district have carried a statement of that sort, you may get 50 requests when you have only four documents. What do you do? You write a courteous letter and tell him your quota is exhausted, and if you are able to get it by trading or otherwise, for any other matter, you will get it and send to him. I assume that is what Members do, because that is the sensible thing to do. You are doing the best you can, but under this system if somebody starts a report in the paper that a popular document has been printed which he can get by writing to his Member of Congress, and you get a thousand requests for it, you can not say your quota is exhausted, because, if you do, they would not believe you. They know you have a credit to begin with of $1,800, and they will think they are entitled to a share of it. A few years ago when the Smithsonian Institution got out one of its annual reports it furnished a newspaper statement to be printed in the press referring to that annual report as the "People's Own Book." I think that was the title, although I am not sure. It was something like that. And all over the country the city press and the country press published the statement that by writing to your Member of Congress you could get a most interesting document called the "People's Own Book." I think I got a thousand requests, and I had 8 copies, maybe 11, at that time. Well, that sort of thing may happen in the future. It may be embarrassing, but that is one of the chances we have to take. We have to take a chance also with the schools telling the school children to write for certain documents. You can send word into my district to the superintendent of half a dozen schools, and I will get a thousand or two thousand requests for anything within a week, coming from that, as has frequently happened to me in the past. We have to take the chances on that.

This scheme will not cost the Government any more. I doubt whether it will cost any less, but it will permit the Member of Congress to receive a document which is of interest to his constituents, which he can send to his constituent, knowing that the person who receives it will examine it, probably read it, receive both information and interest from the reading of it, and he is not required to send out the book in relation to how many ships there are, and the names of them, which his constituents in the inland do not want, or the report of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which his constituents in the inland do not want, or the report about subterranean waters out in Kansas, which they do not want in Illinois, or the geological survey of Colorado, which they do not want in South Carolina. That is what we get now. So I am opposed to the amendment and in favor of the proposition in the bill as they have already modified it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the opposition to the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. BUTLER. I feared that, but I suppose I will not be disorderly if I make a simple statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone who desires to be recognized as favoring the amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] be permitted to proceed for five minutes, to be taken out of the hour's time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that this discussion does not have in it anything that is very exciting. I know that it does not involve contention, and therefore it gets but very little attention; but its subject involves, as I understand—and I would like the chairman of the committee, who is well informed, to give me his attention for a minute—something like a million of dollars' cost to the Government every year. Am I right about that?

Mr. BARNHART. About $750,000 has been the average.

Mr. BUTLER. The purpose of the provision in the present bill is to enable Members to distribute public documents in a way, by a method, that will be more useful to our constituents? I had intended to bring into the House this morning the catalogue or list of public documents furnished to me by the department. You will remember names of the documents are found in a book or catalogue, and the documents are kept in the folding room. I am sorry I forgot to bring the catalogue with me. I should like to have read to the committee the long list of documents which I have not distributed, useless to my constituents, and, indeed, that I do not know where to send. I felt at first, when the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of this committee, spoke to me of this provision that I could not vote for it, for reasons which other gentlemen have already discussed. But those reasons have disappeared, and I believe that this is a wise provision, and I believe that the committee should adopt it. I regret very greatly that Members have not seen fit to attend this session in order to consider it.

Take the eulogies, for instance. We grow fond of each other while in the service here. Our relations are agreeable generally, and when nature works its end with any of us, the going is filled with regret. What do our different constituents know about the humble and inconspicuous Member of Congress? They have no desire for an account of his service or history of his life, yet each Member has placed to his credit 15 or 20 eulogies, containing material interesting to only those who knew him—very expensive publications. I am very glad, indeed, to hand them over to the gentleman who happens to be returned from the district which the deceased Member represented in his lifetime. If you take up your list and examine it, together with what you have to your credit, you will find a great quantity of documents, I presume, that you will never use.

Here is the title of a document—Abridgment of Messages and Documents. What is that document, anyhow? What does it contain? I presume that I should know, but in 18 years' experience I have never had a constituent who asked for the Abridgment of Messages and Documents.

If I had the time, I could go through this long list and what I could say to you might be of some use, perhaps, because of my long experience in the House. A great mass of this material is of no use whatever to my constituents. I further illustrate: I live not far from the Delaware River—it runs by the side of my district—and those of my constituents who have motor boats and other water craft, and those who intend to own one, are properly anxious to have maps of the Coast and Geodetic Survey in order that they be comforted with the knowledge that they have the maps. [Laughter.] They are entitled to the maps, which belong to them. I have spent a good deal of my time hunting for those maps. I think I am regularly allotted 20. I think I supply about 300 or 400. I would like to have a chance to go and order them from the public document room, and that opportunity I shall get if the provision passes. I could illustrate for an hour.

I do not see where an argument can be made against the adoption of this provision, which seems to me so sensible. I presume that some of our constituents will say that we are going to help ourselves to $1,800 extra pay. The gentleman from Illinois suggested that there would be some criticism to that effect. I do not care for the fellow in my district who would say that of me. I can get along; I shall try to find a majority without him; and I do not fear the damage he would desire to create by his ignorant statement. Yet it will work to our disadvantage in one particular, that our constituents may feel that we, having an opportunity to obtain what they wish, ought to get it for them. As for me, I have made it a rule to get what my constituents wish to have, and therefore this misunderstanding will not conflict in any way with my happiness or my usefulness. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] may address the House on a matter apart from the bill, the time to come out of the hour's debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] may address the House on a matter apart from the bill, the time to come out of the hour's debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, what has this administration done for the State of Washington? We hear the constant boast that the Democratic Party since it came into power has written more constructive legislation upon the statute books than any other administration in the history of the Nation. These boastful orators make a slight mistake. What they mean is that this administration has passed more destructive legislation than any other in the history of this Nation. In a few short months this administration has destroyed confidence, paralyzed industry, closed mills and factories, created tramps and beggars, driven millions into idleness, and emptied the National Treasury. Destructive, and not constructive, legislation has ever been the height of Democratic accomplishment.

What has this administration done for Washington? The first thing that it did was to enact a tariff law. Lumber, shingles, fish, coal, lime, and practically all farm and dairy products were placed upon the free list. Immediately upon the enactment of this law mills and factories in the State of Washington began to close. Others began to run on short time. Men were thrown out of employment and wages were reduced. But in British Columbia, just across the international boundary line, mills began to open. They began to run 24 hours in a day. The Democratic tariff law closed our mills, it opened those of the foreigner; the Democratic tariff law took the work and wages from the American, it gave work and wages to the foreigner.

More shingles were brought into the United States from British Columbia in each of the months of June and July, 1914, than ever came into this country before in any one entire year. I select these two months in order that it can not be claimed that the European war had anything to do with the situation. The consumption of shingles in this country has not increased—in fact, it has decreased. So that the number of shingles that we have imported means just that much work and that much wages taken from the American citizen in the State of Washington and given to the Chinaman, the Jap, and the Hindu in British Columbia. The Government has lost the revenue that should have been collected on these shingles, but not a single human being has bought a shingle for a penny less since the new Democratic tariff law was enacted.

The lumber mills of Washington have run on short time. Some of the mills have closed. Many of the men formerly employed in them have been idle, and millions of feet of lumber have been imported. Again just that much wage taken from the American and given to the foreigner. The Government has lost the revenue and not a single American consumer has bought a foot of lumber for a penny less.

The new tariff law has almost destroyed the lime industry in the State of Washington. The output of our factories has been greatly reduced. Our import of lime has increased. We have been made the dumping ground for the lime produced in British Columbia. Many men have been thrown out of employment; the Government has lost the revenue. That much work and that much wages have been taken from the American and given to the foreigner, but no American consumer has bought a bushel of lime for a penny less.

Our great fishing industry, second in importance only to our timber industry, has been greatly injured by the new tariff law. Fish were placed upon the free list. Our industries have been compelled, without protection, to compete with the Government-subsidized fisheries of British Columbia. More fish have been imported into this country than formerly. That much wages and that much work taken from the American fisherman and given to the foreigner. The Government has lost the revenue, but no American consumer has bought his fish for a penny less.

In western Washington alone, while thousands of men are out of employment and looking for work, while thousands of others are working on short time, the present Democratic tariff law each month has taken from the American workingman not less than $3,000,000 and given it to the oriental labor in British Columbia. The Government has lost millions of dollars in revenue, the consumer has not paid less for his products, and no one has been benefited but the foreigner.

Surely the working people of Washington should rise up and call this administration blessed, that has taken the bread out of the mouths of their women and children and given it to the Jap, the Hindu, and the Chinaman.

NO RECIPROCITY.

Or many competitive articles produced in British Columbia we do not charge them the same tariff to sell in our market as they charge us on similar articles to sell in their market. This is true of many of our timber products, of lime and fish, and most agricultural articles. Why should we permit British Columbia to send her competitive products into our markets free when she compels us to pay to send the same products into her markets? Why should we let British Columbia send her lime into this country for less than she lets us send ours into her market? Yet we do this very thing. Why should we let British Columbia send her lumber into this country free when she places a tariff on ours? Why should the Washington farmer pay more to sell his fruit in British Columbia than the British Columbia farmer pays to sell his fruit in the Washington markets? Yet this is exactly what we do. We protested in vain against this injustice when the present Democratic tariff law was being written. We are taught to love our neighbor as ourselves; but to treat the foreigner better than he treats us is not altruistic, it is not good sense, it is blundering stupidity.

It is true that this administration has brought to the people of the State of Washington the inestimable privilege of buying eggs from China, of purchasing butter from New Zealand, of getting meat from Australia, and corn from Japan. The Government upon all these items has lost the revenue, and we are now asked to make up this deficiency by direct taxation. The foreigner has taken that much of the American market from the American producer, but the cost of living has not been reduced. For all these favors conferred by this administration the people of the State of Washington are duly thankful and will express their appreciation at the polls in November.

PANAMA CANAL.

And I have not catalogued all the blessings brought to my State by this administration. The Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore contained this plank:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

The people of the State of Washington believed that the Democratic Party would keep that platform pledge. They had a right to believe it. President Wilson, then a candidate, specifically indorsed this plank of the platform. All Democratic candidates everywhere approved it. A Democratic Congress, after full and exhaustive debate, wrote this declaration into law. The Democratic platform further declared that "our pledges are made to be kept when in office." And President Wilson in one of his speeches when he was a candidate announced that the Democratic platform was not "molasses to catch flies."

Relying upon that platform promise, relying upon the promise of the Democratic candidate for President, relying upon the promises of all Democratic candidates for Congress everywhere, relying upon the solemn promise of the Democratic Party as written into law, the people of Seattle, of Tacoma, and other Puget Sound ports spent millions of dollars, and obligated themselves to spend millions of dollars more, preparing for the benefits that would come to our country by the opening of the Panama Canal.

Who will claim that the Democratic Party kept these promises? Who will claim that the Democratic candidates kept faith with the people? What candidate in any party in the State of Washington will dare to uphold the action of the Democratic Party in regard to the Panama Canal?

No man can point out where there was a single change in conditions from the day that the Baltimore platform was adopted, from the day when Mr. Wilson was nominated, from the day when he wrote his letter of acceptance, from the day when he made his speech approving the tolls plank in the platform, or when there was any other justification, for the Democratic Party, shamelessly and without explanation, cowardly and unpatriotically, betraying the people of the West and disregarding their interests and giving to British Columbia the great benefits of the canal that justly belonged to them. For this action there is but one reason. It was done to secure the influence of the great transcontinental railroads and to purchase the friendship of Great Britain.

This one act alone is sufficient to condemn the Democratic Party forever on the Pacific coast. It is the most brazen refutation of platform promises in the history of this Nation. If the Democratic Party can do this thing and live, then popular government is a failure. In view of this record of the Democratic Party, what is a Democratic promise worth? Who will hereafter believe a promise in a Democratic platform?

No wonder the real leaders in the Democratic Party, like CLARK, UNDERWOOD, FITZGERALD, KITCHIN, and DOREMUS, refused to stultify themselves and voted against the refutation of their platform and their promises. No wonder that Mr. UNDERWOOD called this action of his own party "un-American" and that Speaker CLARK denounced it as "unspeakable degradation." No American citizen in the State of Washington, in any party, will dare attempt to justify this action of the Democratic Party in regard to the Panama Canal.

The repeal of the Panama Canal act raised the freight rate on lumber from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic markets $1.50 per thousand. This increase in freight rates applies not only to that carried through the canal, but also on all that is carried by rail, for the water rate, as everyone knows, to all competing points fixes the rail rates. The repeal of the Panama Canal act increased the freight on every carload that the consumer on the Pacific buys on the Atlantic $60. It increases the freight rate $60 on every carload that the producer on the Pacific sends to the Atlantic. These facts clearly show that President Wilson was right when he declared that the chief purpose of a free canal for American ships was to compel lower rates on our railroads.

SEATTLE AND VANCOUVER.

The increase in freight rates resulting from the repeal of the law giving American ships free passage through the Panama Canal is not the only injury to Seattle nor the greatest danger from this act. The really great markets that the Panama Canal will open to the people of the Pacific coast are the eastern markets of our own country. The Panama Canal will be of little advantage in securing markets in other parts of the world.

The British Columbia lumberman can charter a cheap foreign vessel to reach the eastern markets of the United States; the Washington lumberman can not. He can use only American vessels, built by American labor, and manned by sailors receiving, by comparison, high wages. Here is a difference so great that the American lumberman can not overcome it. It amounts to approximately $2 per thousand feet. And let it not be forgotten that every other American industry on the Pacific coast labors under exactly a similar handicap. The great markets of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other Atlantic cities, by the repeal of the Panama Canal act, were largely taken from us and given to British Columbia. Vancouver, and not Seattle, is to become the great commercial city of the Pacific Northwest if American ships are to receive no advantage in the use of the Panama Canal. For this situation the Democratic Party alone is to blame. The repeal of the present Democratic law is the only hope for the future commercial supremacy of Seattle.

Here is the situation that has been brought about by Democratic legislation, and against which the Republican Representatives of the State of Washington have protested in vain: A builder in Spokane buys a thousand tons of structural steel from the eastern coast. If American ships could pass through the canal free, as they could before the Democratic repeal law went upon the statute books, that steel would be brought to Seattle and then sent to Spokane; but now an American ship must pay the same as a foreign ship to pass through the canal. Consequently, that steel will be sent on a cheap foreign ship to Vancouver, British Columbia, and then from Vancouver to Spokane. This can be done without the payment of a cent of duty. Again, the producer of eastern Washington, when he sends his produce to the Atlantic coast, will ship it to Vancouver—not to Seattle—and from there it will go by a cheap foreign ship, with its foreign crews, to its destination. These foreign cheap vessels, under our laws, can not come to Seattle; but the shipper, by going to Vancouver, can get every advantage of this foreign cheap tonnage. The freight rates between Spokane and Vancouver are exactly the same as the rates between Spokane and Seattle, and this applies, of course, to practically all interior points. When the emergency shipping legislation was pending the Republican Members of the House and Senate from the State of Washington used every endeavor to have this unjust discrimination corrected, but a Democratic majority refused. If such unjust and tyrannical discrimination applied to a city of the South as it applies to Seattle, it would be corrected in less than 90 days.

The wayfaring man can see what is going to be the result of this Democratic legislation. All the trade of the Pacific Northwest that will pass through the Panama Canal, except the very small amount along the water's edge of Puget Sound, will pass through Vancouver. Vancouver will be the place where rail and water traffic will meet. Vancouver and not Seattle will be the great commercial city of the North Pacific. For this situation there is but one remedy, and that is a return of the Republican Party to power. As soon as the Republican Party once more takes control of the Nation it will relieve this situation and redeem the credit and honor of the Nation by immediately reenacting the law that will give every American ship the right to pass through the Panama Canal absolutely free. To this end and to this purpose I expect to strive and fight every day until it is realized as long as I remain a Member of Congress.

The repeal of the Panama Canal provision permitting American ships to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls by the Democratic Party, in spite of their platform pledges, was a fatal blow to Seattle's greatness and prosperity. I can not understand how any American citizen, and especially a citizen of Seattle, can vote for a party that by law deliberately attempts to destroy Seattle in favor of our foreign rival. The people of Seattle do not yet fully understand this situation, but they will as the days go by and as the traffic through the canal increases.

By the repeal of the Panama Canal act the Democratic Party placed a burden upon every industry on the Pacific coast. It increased the cost of living to every family. It favored the railroads as against the people. It favored the foreigner as against the American.

For this great blessing, for this great piece of constructive legislation, for this betrayal of their confidence, for this destruction of their hopes, for this taking from them the benefits of the canal for which they had hoped and for which they had paid and upon the prospects of which they had pledged their credit and expended millions—for thus taking these benefits and giving them to the foreigner without money and without price the people of the Pacific coast are filled with gratitude, and will lift up their voice in pæans of praise for the patriotism and the courage and the integrity and the good faith shown by the Democratic Party.

EMERGENCY SHIPPING LEGISLATION.

The war in Europe caused a great clamor in the Democratic Party, and especially from members of that party in the South, for ships to carry out foreign commerce. Cotton was hit. These southern Members suddenly forgot the fight that they had made for years against an American merchant marine. The cry of subsidy died upon their lips. They demanded immediate relief, and a law intended to help this situation and to get their cotton to market was promptly passed. The people of the Pacific coast pleaded that this law help them also, that provisions be made in this law whereby the products of the Pacific coast could be sent to the Atlantic markets. The lumbermen especially asked for aid. The Pacific coast people pointed out that they were helpless; that the repeal of the Panama Canal act giving free tolls to American ships had given a great advantage to British Columbia. But this plea for relief for the Pacific coast was denied. The South and the East were cared for, and, as usual, the Pacific coast was neglected. Surely the people of the State of Washington should feel grateful to the Democratic Party for the way it was treated in this emergency shipping bill. Under this administration the South has always been carefully cared for, and the Pacific coast is always neglected.

SUSPENSION OF THE NAVIGATION LAWS.

Under the emergency shipping legislation recently passed the President was given the power to suspend the navigation laws with reference to foreign vessels that took the American flag. He had the power of permitting these foreign vessels that took the American flag to be officered by foreigners. The Masters, Mates, and Pilots' Association of the Pacific Coast recently protested against this being done with reference to vessels on the Pacific Ocean. This association pointed out that there were between 600 and 800 American officers on the Pacific that were idle; that they had served their country faithfully; that they had paid for their licenses; and they asked that they be given preference over citizens of other countries, but their protests went unheeded. To-day we have many idle American officers, while many of our ships are manned by foreigners. For this also the people of Puget Sound should give thanks to this administration.

The Democratic Party is now thoroughly committed to the policy of building up our merchant marine by buying foreign ships built in foreign yards by foreign cheap labor, manned by foreign sailors, and run by foreign officers; the only thing American about this Democratic merchant marine being the flag, and even that may have been made in a foreign land.

DEMOCRATIC PROMISES.

The Democratic Party promised to reduce the cost of living and to bring greater prosperity than we possessed in 1912. It was this promise more than anything else that brought the Democratic Party again into power. Who to-day will contend that they have kept that promise? Who to-day will say that they prefer the conditions that exist now to those in 1912? Who will contend that prices have been reduced? Who will contend that wages have been increased? Who will contend that there is more work now than there was when the Democratic administration went into power? Who will deny that there are more idle men now than then? Where is the family that will say that the burden of living is lighter now than then?

When the Democratic Party boasts that it has done much for the State of Washington I challenge the statement. It has not opened a single mill. It has not lighted a single fire in a furnace. It has not given a single man an additional day's work. It has increased no man's wages. It has not given an additional loaf of bread to any family. It has increased idleness. It has increased poverty. It has thrown thousands out of employment. It has reduced wages. It has increased the cost of living for the family of every toiler. Democratic legislation has been sectional. It has been unjustly favorable to the South and unjustly discriminatory against the Pacific coast.

WAR TAXES.

And now the Democratic Party proposes to place upon the State of Washington, as upon all other parts of the country, a "war" tax in time of peace. It is, indeed, a "war" tax. It is a tax made necessary by the Democratic war upon American industry. It is made necessary by the Democratic Party opening our markets, without price, to the goods of foreign countries. It is a free-trade tax. The war may have hastened it, but it would have come anyway. This was certain. Increased expenditures on the one hand and decreased revenues on the other would have suggested to any but Democratic statesmen that the end would be an empty Treasury. A Democratic administration and an empty Treasury are synonymous. For this additional burden of a direct tax in time of peace the people of my State are expected to regard as an additional blessing and to be duly thankful therefor.

ALASKA.

It is the constant boast of this administration that it has been of great benefit to Alaska. Upon what foundation or facts do these claims rest? During this administration legislation has been passed providing for the construction of a railroad in Alaska that may cost $35,000,000. That this legislation was of great benefit to Alaska and the State of Washington we all hope and believe. This proposition to construct a railroad in Alaska was begun under President Taft, and the preliminary work was done during his administration. When this legislation passed Congress it was opposed and favored by men in all parties. The vote was strictly nonpartisan. The strongest opposition to this legislation came from the Democratic chairman of the great Committee on the Public Lands. But the administration is entitled to credit, and no fair-minded man desires to diminish it or to take it from them.

But this building of a railroad in Alaska, if it is accomplished, and little so far has been done except on paper, will amount to nothing unless it is supplemented by other legislation. Unless Congress passes more laws that will develop the coal mines and the other resources of Alaska this railroad, when finished, will be only an idle and discreditable streak of rust.

For more than a year and a half this Democratic administration has been in continuous session. With all its promises and its boasts, what has it done for Alaska? No legislation is yet upon our statute books that will open the coal mines in Alaska, and upon the opening of these mines all progress and development of Alaska waits. A few days ago the so-called coal-leasing bill passed the House. It was passed for political purposes and not for the purpose of the benefit of Alaska. It is impractical and was hurried through the House for the effect it would have upon the so-called conservationists in the East at the coming election. This bill was passed to get votes, not to open mines.

More than 500 coal claims in Alaska are awaiting decisions. These claims have been awaiting decisions ever since this administration went into power on the 4th day of March, 1913. All the facts and evidence in most of these cases have been before the department for more than a year and a half. The people of Alaska have been demanding and petitioning that these claims be decided. The claimants have been clamoring for a decision. What is the reason of this delay? If these claims are fraudulent, why does not the department say so and decide for the Government? This certainly would be in the interest of the people. If, on the other hand, the claimants are honestly entitled to their claims, why does not the department say so? What is the matter? There can be but one explanation. The Democratic officials in the Interior Department do not have the courage to do their duty. They are waiting until after the election. The conditions in Alaska, so far as the coal claims are concerned, stand exactly as they did four years ago. There is no justification for such action. While these officials stand and wait, fearing to act, the people of Alaska are forced to pay exorbitant prices for foreign coal, while they dare not touch the unlimited supply that lies at their very doors. And yet this administration proceeds in a loud voice to proclaim that they are special friends of Alaska.

The people of Alaska and the State of Washington pleaded with Congress to give a small appropriation to locate the dangerous rocks and other obstructions to navigation along the Alaskan coast. They presented their petition and filed with it a list showing an appalling loss of life and property. The number of vessels that have recently gone to their doom tell a story that it was thought this Democratic Congress must certainly heed. Personally I wrote a letter to every Member of the House and Senate pointing out the result of these disasters and asking in the name of humanity, the people of Alaska and the Northwest, that a small sum be appropriated for this purpose. This appeal for this appropriation was refused with scant consideration.

In all the countless millions appropriated by this Congress—the most extravagant in the history of the Nation—there was nothing to make more safe navigation between Puget Sound and Alaska.

Again the people of Alaska asked for a small appropriation for hospitals and medical assistance for the natives of that Territory. They pointed out the fearful ravages that disease is making among these people, the necessity of aid to save them from extermination. But the insignificant sum of $50,000 asked for this purpose was rejected. Certainly the people of Alaska should feel grateful to this Democratic Congress when they look upon this record and when they see the extravagance in all other departments and then remember that they have been denied these small pittances to protect their most vital interests.

BUSINESS AGITATION.

Like all other sections, the State of Washington and Alaska have been greatly injured by the constant agitation and attacks on business since the Democratic Party came into power. The fear and uncertainty caused by proposed legislation for political purposes only has injured the entire Nation. This agitation will continue as long as the Democratic Party remains in power. It must continue, for the foundation of all our industrial disturbance to-day is the Underwood tariff law. The Democratic Party, of course, will never consent that it be changed. Consequently they must continue to agitate and to do something else to try to overcome the evil effect of our present tariff. What this Nation needs to-day above all things else is an adjournment of Congress. What we need is more prosperity and less legislation. Congress will stay in practically continuous session as long as the Democratic Party controls the country. The one hope for prosperity and for business peace is a Republican majority in the next House of Representatives.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD very briefly on the subject of general legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD relating to the legislation of this Congress. Is there objection?

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I ask for the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LEE] asks for the same privilege. Is there objection to these two requests?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman desiring to be recognized, the question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 68. PAR. 2. The superintendent of documents shall supply, wrap, mail, and otherwise dispatch all publications subject to valuation distribution upon the written order of the person entitled to the same, who shall furnish addressed frank slips or envelopes therefor; and the superintendent of documents shall charge a price uniform to everyone for publications so supplied sufficient to cover the cost of paper, handling, and printing from plates as determined by the Public Printer: Provided, That upon the requisition of the superintendent of documents the Public Printer is hereby authorized to print or reprint from time to time a sufficient number of copies of such publications as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section: Provided further, That the superintendent of documents shall promptly furnish each person entitled to a valuation account or document quota under this section with information and the prices of all publications available for such distribution in advance of printing the first edition thereof, if possible, and he shall also render statements from time to time to each person entitled to the same concerning the condition of his valuation account.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 11, after the word "supplied," strike out the words "sufficient to cover the" and insert ", which price shall be the actual."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like, if I can, to know what this provision means, anyhow. What is it that this provision does?

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will permit, I will state that there is another amendment; there are three. One strikes out the word "handling," and another makes it the actual cost of paper and printing. As I stated in my opening remarks to-day, this was contemplated in the bill all the way. That word "handling" there might be construed to mean that there would be a charge for wrapping, and it is the intention of the committee to have these documents supplied at the cost of the actual printing, because the Printing Office has the labor to do the necessary wrapping.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my friend from Indiana that I think it is still left in doubt as to what it means, even with that provision stricken out. Let us see what it says. This is a very important section under this valuation plan. The preceding section provides for the valuation credits. Then this paragraph comes along and says:

The superintendent of documents shall supply, wrap, mail, and otherwise dispatch all publications subject to valuation distribution upon the written order of the person entitled to the same, who shall furnish addressed frank slips or envelopes therefor; and the superintendent of documents shall charge a price uniform to everyone for publications so supplied sufficient to cover the cost of paper, handling, and printing from plates as determined by the Public Printer.

Now, is this "paper, handling, and printing from plates" the cost of printing the editions, or is it the cost in the office of the superintendent of documents? The superintendent of documents plainly has nothing to do with the printing from plates, nor would the superintendent of documents, where he has gone to the expense of handling documents, transfer to the Public Printer the authority to determine the amount. And while that provision, in connection with the preceding one, might lead to the impression—and possibly that was the impression of the author of the bill—that the cost to be charged to a Member was the cost of wrapping and the wrapping paper used, still the language of the bill does not carry out that thought. We both want to get at the same thing——

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; we are both aiming at the same thing. The intention is to perfect this provision and make it right and clear.

Mr. MANN. So that we will know what it means.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. The paragraph as amended will read, beginning in line 9—

And the superintendent of documents shall charge a price uniform to everyone for publications so supplied, which price shall be the actual cost of paper and printing from plates as determined by the Public Printer.

The superintendent of documents will be instructed by the Public Printer as to exactly this cost, and that is what he must charge; no more and no less.

Mr. MANN. Here are two charges, and I want to know which one this refers to. I should like to have the gentleman's statement for future reference in construction. There is one charge for printing the documents, and there is paper and there is handling, and there is presswork in connection with printing from plates. There is another charge, entirely separate from that, after the edition has been printed, when a Member makes a requisition for certain copies of that edition. There is a charge for wrapping and handling in the office of the superintendent of documents. Now, which of these two charges is referred to here?

Mr. BARNHART. I have explained to the gentleman that the amendment offered by the committee will strike out the word "handling." That will eliminate the wrapping feature, and the bill, when it is perfected, will read—

Which price shall be the actual cost of paper and printing from plates as determined by the Public Printer.

It will not include the cost of making the plates, but just the reprint.

Mr. MANN. If the cost is for printing the edition. I do not think the word "handling" ought to come out, because in fixing the price at which these documents are furnished to a Member he should be charged with the cost of the paper that is used in the book, the cost of handling in the Printing Office in connection with the work of printing, and the cost of the presswork. He should be charged with all that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. If it means the cost of handling, then the word "handling" ought to be in. If it means that the Members are to be charged with the cost of wrapping and mailing out the documents, then we ought to strike it out entirely, or else strike out the presswork cost.

Mr. BARNHART. It is understood in printing offices that the cost of paper and the cost of reprinting from plates would imply the handling of the plates and the handling of the paper for that part of the work. It is not merely putting it on the press; it is the work of assembling it and getting it ready for printing and adjusting the press. That is all a part of the printing.

Mr. MANN. That is all a part of the cost of printing?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the Printing Office keeps those items separately. Now, you undertake to say here what cost shall be included in fixing the cost, and you say "paper." The cost of paper does not include any handling by itself in the Printing Office. There is the cost of the paper and the cost of printing from the plates. Of course plainly that was intended to cut out the cost of composition, but the cost of preparing the plates is plainly intended to be included, and ought to be. Now, if you cut out handling in the Printing Office and charge nothing but the cost of the paper and the presswork itself, and if this means the cost of the edition, why the word "handling" ought to stay in. But if it does not mean that—and there has been a question raised about it—why there is another proposition. I wish the gentleman would say for the benefit of the RECORD and of those who are going to construe this law whether this cost that is to be charged to Members is to be the cost in the office of the superintendent of documents or the cost of printing the edition in the Public Printing Office only.

Mr. BARNHART. The language would clearly set forth that it would be the cost in the office of the Public Printer only, because it specifies the paper and printing. Now, I have explained to the gentleman from Illinois that the present law carries a 10 per cent increase over the cost of paper and printing, to bear certain expenses that it was alleged it cost in getting work ready for delivery after it was done. But in conference with the Public Printer it was found that this varies so widely, and that inasmuch as he has a force used largely for that purpose——

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. BARNHART. So it was thought best to strike that out entirely and let the general appropriation for the Public Printer take care of the matter of making everything ready for delivery that he prints, whether it is for sale or whether it is allotments to Members of Congress.

Mr. MANN. I understand that; but I submitted this matter to several gentlemen, some of them in the House and some of them employees of the House, and among them the very efficient clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing. I will not undertake to say what he said or what the others said, but a number of them stated to me upon reading this that their judgment was that this would cover the cost of wrapping and mailing from the office of the superintendent of documents. I said I thought the bill was intended only to cover the cost of the edition, and I understand that the gentleman from Indiana takes that position, although I have not been able to get him to say so without qualification.

Mr. BARNHART. If I have not made myself clear, I am sorry.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman say in so many words whether that is his opinion?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly when you remove the word "handling" you remove the possibility of any charge for wrapping.

Mr. MANN. But you do not remove the charge for wrapping paper. I contend that the provision does not include the office of superintendent of documents at all. You can not mix them; it is one or the other.

Mr. BARNHART. So long as it sets forth, with the word "handling" out of it, that it shall cover the cost of printing from plates and paper, I do not see how anyone can construe that language to mean that there should be an additional cost for wrapping.

Mr. MANN. Is it to cover the cost of wrapping paper?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly not. They wrap most all documents printed, whether they are for sale or to be distributed under allotment, and it is not intended to cover wrapping paper at all.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman another question? This says:

The superintendent of documents shall supply, wrap, mail, and otherwise dispatch all publications subject to valuation distribution upon the written order of the person entitled to the same, who shall furnish addressed frank slips or envelopes therefor.

That would apparently say that all the documents subject to valuation distribution—and that will include everything after it goes into effect except those things which Members now have in the folding room—should be distributed by the superintendent of documents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimus consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Apparently that language would indicate that all the distribution is to be made by the superintendent of documents. I think we had a sort of understanding in the House the other day, based on several votes which were had, that if the folding room of the House should be retained—and that is purely a matter for the House to determine hereafter—Members might draw out their quota of books under the credit balance and transfer them to the superintendent of the folding room in the House. In other words, if we print an edition of The Horse Book this year, and a Member is entitled under the law and desires to avail himself of the right of taking 500 copies, which he does not wish to distribute at once, only as the demands come in, he may transfer them to the folding room of the House for storage, and so supply the documents as the requests come to him, because there will not be an edition printed every year. I think the language ought to be corrected so as to clearly show that we have that right.

Mr. BARNHART. In line 6, Mr. Chairman, of section 68, paragraph 2, one of the amendments sent to the desk will change the language as follows:

The superintendent of documents shall supply, wrap, mail, or otherwise dispatch all publications subject to mailing.

He may wrap and mail them or dispatch them up here to the Capitol, as he is directed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, being in charge of the bill, is of the opinion that if that language is modified in that way and enacted into law, if any Member desires he may order from the superintendent of documents a hundred copies of a certain publication to be sent to his credit in the folding room as long as the House maintains the folding room?

Mr. BARNHART. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he has no doubt about it, but which way?

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman asked me a question if I believed so and so, and I say I have no doubt about it. It seems to me I could not make it any clearer.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman might have no doubt that I was wrong. It is hard to get the gentleman to state square-toed his position without some qualification.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will state to me in clear language what he means, I think I can answer him. I can not surmise what the gentleman wants me to say in addition to saying that I have no doubt, under the provisions of this bill and the amendment, that he will be permitted to direct the superintendent of documents to send such volumes as he may desire to the folding room, where he can get them at such times as he desires.

Mr. MANN. That is what I have been trying to get the gentleman to say.

Mr. BARNHART. And it is what I have constantly been saying.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Does the chairman think that if these books should be placed to the credit of Members in the folding room and a number were left when his term of office expired, they would pass to the credit of his successor?

Mr. BARNHART. They ought to. They would be to the credit of the district; that is the provision of the bill.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. With pleasure.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the chairman in reference to the same paragraph. I had understood that this paragraph would probably abolish the folding room. Is there any intention of doing that?

Mr. BARNHART. No.

Mr. FESS. With the paragraph as it stands, amended as you have suggested, we could get our documents from the folding room the same as we do now?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly; if Members choose to do it that way. It would make it more expensive if you have them sent up here to the House folding room. The House folding room was continued for the purpose of having speeches folded and in order to have the advantages and conveniences and efficiency of such a service near at hand for the Congress.

Mr. FESS. My desire was to know whether we would have to go to the superintendent of public documents for a document for ourselves?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I think any order that the gentleman would give to the superintendent of documents might be filled by sending it to the gentleman's office, or he might send it at the gentleman's direction by mail or to the House folding room, but it will be charged to the gentleman when it is given to his order. It will be out of the care and keeping of the superintendent of documents at the Printing Office after it leaves his custody, and it will then be charged to the Member's allotment.

Mr. FESS. If I were sending a document to my district, I would not care so much, but if I wanted it for my own use here I think I could get it much more quickly from the folding room than I could get it from the superintendent of documents.

Mr. BARNHART. That might and it might not be true, because the intention is to use the Printing Office delivery. If the gentleman wanted it sent to his office, it would go directly to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNHART. I have another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 12, after the word "paper," strike out the word "handling."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 6, after the word "wrap," strike out the words "mail, and" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and mail or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, page 77, line 5, after section 68, paragraph 2, the following: "All publications for valuation distribution upon orders of the Vice President, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Resident Commissioners, and officers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives shall be delivered to their respective folding rooms, to be wrapped and credited to the persons entitled to them and held subject to the orders of said persons.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to explain that a little. This amendment has the effect of sending these documents to our folding rooms. I expect that is the intention of the committee, or I gathered it from the colloquy that has been had. If it is not the intention of the committee to send these documents to our folding rooms, then it seems to me the amendment ought to go in there in that form.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. One of the purposes of this bill is to effect dispatch of the public service, and economy. The Government has just constructed a post office adjacent to the Government Printing Office, with connecting tubes, and the cost of hauling these documents to the Capitol and letting them lie here and then hauling them back to the post office is the very thing that the Committee on Appropriations has been eliminating from all the departments, because it is an extra cost. If the House sees fit to send its force to the Government Printing Office, that is what it ought to do; but the discontinuance of hauling these documents to the Capitol and storing them here and then going to the expense of hauling them back to the post office is one of the economies of this bill, and I do not see how the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], if he has any concern for economy, which we are seeking to effect, together with efficiency of getting the documents out quickly, can oppose the plan proposed here. If you want to send your documents to the House folding room here, under the changes that have been made, you can have them all sent down here; but a Member would hardly want to do that. If he wants to send his documents by mail, he will send direct to the superintendent of documents and have them sent out from there, and there is no provision in this bill anywhere that that may not be done by the wrapping force that we now have. It is in the hands of the House. It does not take it out of the hands of the House at all.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, if it is in the hands of the House now, and it is not designed to take it out of the hands of the House, and there is nothing in this except the question of where the documents shall be hauled to or from, what is the objection to the amendment? Whether the folding room is located in some convenient quarter adjacent to the Government Printing Office or located in this Capitol Building is immaterial, but the question that is material is whether it remains under the control and jurisdiction of the Members of this House; and if the chairman means what he says about that, that it is the intention that it shall remain under the control and jurisdiction of the Members of this House, then he and I have no dispute as to where this wrapping shall be done. Of course I recognize the general policy adopted by the committee, to prevent unnecessary hauling of documents back and forth across town. I recognize it is utterly immaterial for the purposes of this bill or any other whether that folding room be adjacent to the Public Printing Office or in this building. In fact, I think it ought to be adjacent to the Public Printing Office, but I think the vital point is whether it remains under the control of the membership of this House. There is nothing in my amendment that militates against the economy proposition of having the document room adjacent to where the documents are printed, and I hope the chairman will accept the amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the committee could not accept an amendment of that kind for the reason that it is estimated by the Public Printer that the transportation of documents back and forth, and so forth, as now done, costs $20,000 a year. If the gentleman from Missouri wants to insist that we should pay $20,000 a year to haul documents from the post office up here in order to handle them here and then send them back to the post office, then it would appear to me that he is advocating a proposition that is far from economic, and I trust that he will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. I trust the gentleman will not mistake the issue that is between us. The gentleman referred to that awhile ago about the Government hauling documents over here. There is no such issue involved in this amendment. There is no $20,000 involved. Then, what further objection has the gentleman to it?

Mr. BARNHART. The objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri is that it provides that all documents shall be brought to the folding room here at the Capitol and wrapped and then carried back to the post office.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. It provides that they shall go to our folding room and remain under the control of the Members of this House, and it does not provide that they shall be brought to this Capitol.

Mr. BARNHART. Then, what——

Mr. BORLAND. It provides exactly what the chairman said was provided by this bill.

Mr. BARNHART. It will necessitate an extra system of bookkeeping.

Mr. BORLAND. It does provide a system of bookkeeping.

Mr. BARNHART. I said an extra system, not a system.

Mr. BORLAND. It provides the present system of bookkeeping and has no other purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 3 of the Borland amendment, after the word "shall," insert "upon the individual order of the person entitled thereto."

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that ought to be acceptable to both gentlemen. That would permit any Member to order any documents to his credit.

Mr. BARNHART. I want to ask the gentleman's pardon to have the amendment reread; I was engaged at the moment.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to hear it also, as I was engaged with the chairman.

Mr. MANN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri would require all documents coming to any Member of Congress to be sent to the folding rooms of the House and the Senate. The amendment which I have offered would leave to the individual Member to determine what documents he will have sent to his respective folding room.

Mr. BARNHART. The committee will readily accept that; that is the very point aimed at.

Mr. MANN. That will leave to the Member the authority to have documents sent to the folding room, which I suppose will be exercised in some cases. In many cases clearly it would be economical and equally efficient to have documents mailed from the office of the superintendent of documents, and it would leave to the Member the control of the matter.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. As I understand the purport of the gentleman's amendment, they would be folded at the Government Printing Office and then brought over on the individual order of any Member.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it would be necessary that they should be folded. I understood from the statement made a while ago that a Member might order the documents sent to him before they had been folded, to his room or otherwise; that is, before they had been wrapped. It would not make any difference where it is done.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, as far as I am personally concerned, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois would not change the situation to me. It has been my universal custom to have all documents sent to my own office, and I inspect and sort out everything that is sent there, so that I am sure what I send out to my constituents is something important to the particular men to whom I am sending them. It is a vast amount of work which I do in my own office, and I would not object to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, but I think we ought to have somewhere provided in this bill this system of bookkeeping by which a Member has, under control of the House, a knowledge of what he has to his own credit. I understand that is preserved in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and I am perfectly willing to accept it.

Mr. BARNHART. The Government Printing Office is under the control of the Congress.

Mr. MANN. No; it is controlled by a gentleman named by the President.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes and no; but Congress has legislative control.

Mr. MANN. I think this would protect everybody's rights.

Mr. BARNHART. I appreciate that fact, but I would like to inquire of the gentleman just where this amendment comes.

Mr. MANN. After the word "shall," insert "upon the individual order of the person entitled thereto."

Mr. BARNHART. That makes it plain, so that nobody could misunderstand it.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. BARNHART. That would complicate the matter to adopt both amendments.

Mr. MANN. No; my amendment is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 68. PAR. 4. Documents specifically ordered by Congress for congressional valuation distribution and the following publications shall be printed and subject to distribution by the superintendent of documents under the provisions of this section: Provided, That the superintendent of documents shall supply, on the request of the Vice President, or any Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner, not to exceed two copies each of any publication of the Government not provided for by this section which he may have available in stock and charge the same against their respective valuation accounts; and if the publications so furnished were printed for sale by the superintendent of documents, the Public Printer shall credit the amount charged therefor to the reprint account of said superintendent by transferring a like sum from the allotment for printing and binding for Congress: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to include the speeches of any Senator, Representative, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner in whatever form printed.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment by the committee making a verbal correction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, line 23, after the word "against," strike out the word "their" and insert the word "his."

Mr. MADDEN. I would like the gentleman to explain how that will make it read.

Mr. BARNHART. "Which he may have available in stock and charge the same against his," so as to simply agree with the antecedent "he" and make it good language.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman want to change the word "accounts" to "account"? I think that would be proper. The object the gentleman desires is not accomplished unless he changes the word "accounts" to the word "account."

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I think that is right and that that should also be in the singular, but let us have a vote on this and then I shall move to strike out the letter "s" in the word "accounts."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move that, in line 24, the letter "s" in the word "accounts" be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, line 24, strike out the letter "s" from the word "accounts."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman also wants to strike out the word "respective."

Mr. BARNHART. That refers, however, to the Senators, Representatives, Vice Presidents, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners.

Mr. MANN. You would not say "respective account." "Respective" refers to plural.

Mr. BARNHART. I think, Mr. Chairman, the word "respective" ought to go out, and I move that, in line 4, it be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 78, line 24, strike out the word "respective."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(1) Addresses and messages of the President to Congress: Provided, That the annual message of the President shall be printed in pamphlet form immediately upon its receipt by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to make an inquiry. We do not have to pay for the President's messages which are laid on our desks, do we?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; there is a provision that the usual number will be printed, and this is only for a reprint that goes to the valuation plan. In addition to that, each Member may have two copies of any document. That is the general provision.

Mr. MANN. This section covers the congressional distribution, as I understand?

Mr. BARNHART. As the gentleman well knows, there is now an abridgment of the allotment of messages.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the abridgment; I am talking about the messages which the President comes here and reads to us or sends to us.

Mr. BARNHART. This does not change the present plan in that respect as to the annual messages that come here from time to time. It does not change the law in printing the usual number that is now printed. This will make it possible, if you want more than that, to order from allotment. If there should be a reprint ordered by the House and it were sent to the folding room for distribution, it would then give you the privilege of taking under your valuation plan any number of such messages as you would choose to send out in addition to what you were given under the usual number printed for the House.

Mr. MANN. Now, just as a matter of practice, it is usual when the President's annual message is presented to Congress to have it printed in advance, have copies of it on the floor and distributed to Members at the time the message is delivered to the House. I do not see how it can be done under this. Maybe it can.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, Mr. Chairman, these copies that come in advance, of course, are White House copies. They are the President's publication. He has a printing allotment, too, and, in addition, when the usual number is asked you have them just the same as you have now, and, furthermore, if anyone should want a larger number than has already been printed, and a resolution should be passed to that effect, they would be sent to the folding room, just as they would be now, and they would be charged against your allotment.

Mr. MANN. I had supposed they were copies that came from the document room.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Does this paragraph refer to the compilation of addresses and messages of the President which we receive each session?

Mr. BARNHART. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) Congressional Directory: Provided, That there shall be prepared, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, not to exceed two editions of the Congressional Directory during each session of Congress. The first edition shall be distributed to the Vice President, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Resident Commissioners, the principal officials of Congress, and the heads of the executive departments, independent offices, and establishments of the Government on the first day of the session, and shall be ready for distribution to others within one week thereafter. The number and disposition of such directories shall be under the control of the Joint Committee on Printing, except as otherwise provided in this section. Official correspondence concerning the directory may be had in penalty envelopes, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. The compiler of the Congressional Directory shall be appointed by the Joint Committee on Printing and shall receive a compensation of $1,600 per annum.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 80, line 4, after the word "receive," strike out the words "a compensation of $1,600 per annum" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$1,600 for compiling, preparing, and indexing the Congressional Directory for each regular session of Congress, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard upon the amendment. This amendment is an addition to the provision here?

Mr. BARNHART. The amendment, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, is really the readoption of the present law in the bill. And, in brief, I might say there were two purposes of it, one is that it is in harmony with what——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$1,600" and inserting "$1,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out "$1,600" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,000."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should have preferred to have offered another amendment first. A couple of years ago, I think it was, we had a discussion in the House here over payment to the person who got up the Congressional Directory, and the Democratic side of the House threw several cat fits. It was asserted we were paying at that time, and I think we were, $1,000 or $1,200 or $1,400 to somebody whose duty it was to get up the directory, and that that person was paying $300 or $400 to have somebody else do the work, and that the difference was a rake-off. And I expect it was true. My recollection is that a former newspaper correspondent, who has since passed away, was the person charged with the duty of preparing the material and supervising the work of getting up the Congressional Directory; that he had transferred the work to some one else whom they said at the time had done the work from time immemorial, and the person who did the work was receiving $300 or $400 or $500 a year, or something like that. Maybe I have the figures too small or maybe too great. Anyway, it was far below the price paid.

I think the price paid originally was less than $1,600. Now, that contemplated getting out five editions of the directory for each Congress at least. This bill contemplates doing away with one edition of the directory—and I think it is a mistake—but at the same time it contemplates keeping up the price. The fact is that the Congressional Directory in the main has grown to be a laughable farce. Whoever gets it up does not understand his business. It used to give information about Members of Congress. It does not give any now, unless some comparatively new Member of Congress falls for the request and proceeds to furnish something which he supposes will make people believe it came from some other source, and not from himself, and when he reads in the directory how valuable a man he has been, he blushes and says, "I will never do it again."

Why, the directory used to give the vote for Members of Congress. It does not do it any more. There is hardly a southern Member of Congress that inserts the vote that he gets, and many of the northern Members do not do it any more. In the old days the compiler of the Congressional Directory obtained this information, if it was not furnished to him by the Member of Congress; but he does not do it now. Much of the material that is in the Congressional Directory is not down to date.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Would the gentleman from Illinois admit that the compiler of the Congressional Directory should add to or take from any copy that has been prepared by Members for it? Does the gentleman think that ought to be done?

Mr. MANN. I think they ought to furnish the vote. If it is done in one case, it ought to be done in every case.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I recall clearly when I first came to Congress that I inserted the vote that I had received. The first time, as I recall, I had 290 plurality, the next time 420 plurality, the next time 1,200, and the next time nearly 12,000. I was too modest to use it.

Mr. MANN. The next time the gentleman will leave it out, and for another reason. [Laughter.] The first time I had it in the directory I had 29,000 majority.

Mr. BARNHART. And you put it in?

Mr. MANN. No; I took it out. I thought people would think it too large, and would urge the making of another district. My first biography in the directory was very short. It is now even shorter. It does not amount to a row of pins. You propose to fix it so that it will not amount to anything. At the long session you propose to fix it so that there will be only two editions of the Congressional Directory. At the long session, of course, the committees are appointed, and the first edition will be printed before the committees are appointed. The second edition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The second edition ought to be printed immediately after the committees are appointed, and that has been the practice in the past. The first edition is ready on meeting day, at the beginning of December. The second edition has always been furnished at the beginning of January. Now, you propose to eliminate that, or else have no other edition of the directory for a year, and pay the compiler, who does but little work—and he does not do what little he does do correctly—an exorbitant salary. I do not know who does this work now, but I know that $500 would be good pay for the editorial work of compiling the directory. So I have offered to make the pay $1,000, and thus pay him double.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to see the gentleman from Illinois assume an air of economy at this late date. In the Fifty-eighth Congress, a Republican Congress—and this is not any reflection on it—they decided that a competent man, a man who is capable of editing, preparing, proof reading, and, in fact, exercising a general supervision over publications of the Congressional Directory, ought to be paid $1,600.

Nobody has objected to that up to the present time. And I want to say, in defense of the present compiler of the Congressional Directory, that he does give his time all to the preparation of the Congressional Directory. He does more than act as a figurehead. He is not a newspaper man. He is the compiler of the Congressional Directory; and I believe the House can trust the Joint Committee on Printing to see to it that the compiler of the Congressional Directory will attend to his duties.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I would like to finish this statement, then I will yield.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is no fault of the compiler of the Congressional Directory if a Member of Congress furnishes him with a biography that is ridiculous. But, as I stated to the gentleman from Illinois, I doubt seriously if any Member of this House, after he furnishes the copy for his biography, would like to delegate to the compiler of the directory the privilege of adding to or taking from that biography as he saw fit. A partisan compiler in that case might make the Republicans look ridiculous or the Democrats look righteous and the Progressives look like nothing. [Laughter.] There is a strong probability that something of that kind might be done.

So far as the compensation is concerned, Mr. Chairman, heretofore, when there was an extra edition of the directory, the Republican Congress always paid the compiler of the Directory $800 for that extra edition. I think it was too much; and in the past few years it has not been done. The compiler now gets $1,600 for as many editions as the Joint Committee on Printing authorizes, and the purpose of the committee is not to take anything from it, but to try to make it better. For the information of the gentleman from Illinois, I hold in my hand a petition that has just been submitted to the joint committee to make the Congressional Directory still better by inserting the photograph of every Member of the House and Senate, and the petition sets forth with considerable argument the idea that it would be a great educator. And instead of the Congressional Directory being ridiculous, as the gentleman from Illinois alleges, I find it to be in the greatest demand of any Government document that I have to give out. Ministers and teachers and readers generally like it, and there is more demand on me for it than I have copies to supply; and I think that is true with other Members of the House.

Now, of course the reduction of the salary might possibly make the Congressional Directory better. It might eliminate some of these objections that the gentleman from Illinois sees. But I hardly see how that could be. The bill as it is arranged provides for large economies. It provides sufficient salaries, and yet eliminates every unnecessary expense that the committee could find. The committee believed that a man competent to edit and prepare as important a book as the Congressional Directory should be worth $1,600 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I had always been under the impression that this $1,600 salary was more or less of a perquisite for some attaché to the Committee on Printing. The gentleman stated that the man who performs this work of compilation gives his exclusive time to its preparation. Am I correct?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. He has an office in the Maltby Building, and has had it there for several years.

Mr. STAFFORD. That man, then, does nothing else than attend to the compiling of the Congressional Directory?

Mr. BARNHART. That is his exclusive business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] said that my ideas of economy were belated. They began before the gentleman was in public life, and they have always been adhered to. A few Congresses ago, when some of the Democratic Members endeavored to cut down the pay of the compiler of the Congressional Directory, I sympathized and worked with them. It is a wonder that the gentleman will not do now the same thing that he was then trying to do. I have maintained a consistent position. I was in favor all the time of reducing the excessive pay of a nearly useless official. But the gentleman says that we paid the compiler $1,600 when the Republicans had control, and therefore the Democrats should pay him $1,600 now. Well, in this bill they have cut off one edition out of three of the Congressional Directory for the long session, but although they have removed all of this onerous work from this overworked official they have not proposed any decrease in the pay of the official. Now, as a matter of fact, outside of the biographies most of the Congressional Directory is the same all the time. All that it is necessary to do is to change a few names and addresses, and they do not do that correctly. Frequently, being forced to examine the Congressional Directory for information, I find grievous errors in it, although the error I have in mind just now did not occur in the Congressional Directory, and although I do not know whether the compiler of that directory is the one who got up the Biographical Directory, or history of Members of Congress, the record of all Members of Congress. I had occasion to consult that yesterday. There is an old edition and a new edition. There used to be a Member of the House from my State by the name of Herman W. Snow. He was celebrated in his day because he had beaten Uncle Joe. Afterwards he was Sergeant at Arms of the House. We have just been copying from one of his circular letters about reduction in pay, much to the discomfort of the Members of the House. The old directory gave him as living in Illinois. It did not say, I believe, that he was elected from Illinois. They have recently revised that history. I think the same man did it, although I am not sure; but in the new and revised edition they elected Mr. Snow a Member of Congress from Georgia. Is not that a valuable compilation to have? It is just about as valuable as most of the information in the directory.

Mr. BARNHART. The difficulty about the gentleman's statement is that the compiler of the directory did not have anything to do with that. It was gotten out by the printing clerk of the Senate, who was employed to do an entirely different work, and he had no responsibility on him except to get out that publication and get the money for it.

Mr. MANN. I have never been able to find out before who did get it out.

Mr. BARNHART. He was the man who got it out.

Mr. MANN. But I suspect that the compiler of the directory is the man who really got it out—perhaps not the present compiler.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman from Illinois think he is reflecting on many sources of curious and valuable information when he criticizes the directory as he does? Think of the advantages to be obtained from the biographical sketches in the directory.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman is not referring to his own biographical sketch or mine. I believe the shortest one that was in the directory was the biographical sketch of a Member who has left us for reasons which appealed to several Members.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois should prevail, it must necessarily imply that we shall find some gentleman in Washington, D. C., who will take this position and do this work. No man would come here any distance at all from his home for such a salary as that. We have some rights of patronage for our home districts. You have those rights on your side when you are in control and we have them when we are in control. According to this amendment it would be necessary to pick up somebody in Washington who would be willing to take that work part of the year, instead of having a man upon whom the responsibility rests all the time, because we all realize that no man can afford to come here and work and live in Washington in these days for a thousand dollars a year. The gentleman from Illinois says the committee is not trying to economize, but I say he is mistaken. The committee doubted the propriety of issuing an extra edition of the Congressional Directory and paying $800 to the compiler for each edition. Instead of that it limited it to three editions and paid him the same that he is now receiving. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman substitutes, instead of an annual salary, a compensation based upon the number of editions of the Congressional Directory?

Mr. BARNHART. Not that. It simply pays him for the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the amendment?

Mr. BARNHART. One of the purposes of the amendment is that it would eliminate the possibility, under the language as it stands now, of the Joint Committee on Printing bringing some man here and having him do the work, and then discharging him and putting some political henchman in the place to finish up the year. Under the present language that might be done if the Joint Committee on Printing saw fit to do so. Stranger things have happened. This simply eliminates that possibility. It employs a man to do the work for $1,600 a year, and yet he can not be discharged at the end of a month. Of course he could be discharged for inefficiency or failure to perform his duties, but it would not enable the committee to discharge a man after he had performed the work and then appoint some one else to draw the balance of the annual salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have the proposed amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARNHART:
Page 80, line 4, after the word "receive," strike out the words "a compensation of $1,600 per annum" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$1,600 for compiling, preparing, and indexing the Congressional Directory for each regular session of Congress, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."
Amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. MANN:
Strike out the figures "$1,600" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the gentleman's proposition is to include all the compensation that the compiler is to receive.

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana says:

For compiling, preparing, and indexing the Congressional Directory for each regular session of Congress.

Mr. BARNHART. He is to have $1,600 for compiling the directory for each session.

Mr. MANN. It says "each regular session of Congress." How much is he to get when we have a special session?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it the gentleman's idea that it will come to $4,800 when we have three sessions?

Mr. BARNHART. What is the proposition of the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. We had a special session of Congress last year, and I think we had a Congressional Directory.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course I am not in favor of paying $1,600 for each session of Congress, and I take it the gentleman is not.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. It says $1,600 for each regular session. I think it reads "for compiling the directory for each session of Congress."

Mr. BARNHART. "For compiling and indexing the directory for each regular session of Congress."

Mr. MANN. How much will be paid for a special session?

Mr. BARNHART. It would probably have to be specifically provided for, if a directory was ordered. That would be in the hands of the House, if they deemed it necessary to order it. Under this bill he would not be permitted to go ahead and issue an edition without the order of the House.

Mr. MANN. The bill proposes to pay $1,600 per annum, and you propose to pay $1,600 for two regular sessions of Congress. It is sure that when there is a special session there will be a directory ordered and printed, as there ought to be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would not the same construction be placed on this language, "each regular session," as is now placed on it with reference to the provision giving Members mileage?

Mr. MANN. That is the construction that is placed upon it.

Mr. BARKLEY. It has been construed that the language "each regular session" includes a special session.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BARKLEY. The law with reference to mileage reads "each regular session."

Mr. MANN. The law does not provide mileage for a special session.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then what authority is there for appropriating mileage at a special session?

Mr. MANN. Congress has the power to appropriate money to build machines in the moon, and it may do so some time. When we have a special session it diverts the appropriation made for the regular session to pay the mileage for the special session. They have done that in repeated instances.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought that a ruling had been made by the Treasury Department that the language "regular session" applied also to special sessions.

Mr. MANN. Not at all; that is not the case. Quite the contrary.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in order to remove any doubt in the minds of gentlemen, this proposes to pay a compensation of $1,600 a year. Is not that right?

Mr. BARNHART. It is.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then why not say that that shall be the compensation per annum; that it shall be the duty of the officer to compile an index and directory for each session of Congress, regular or special, as the case may be, at a compensation of $1,600 per annum. Would not that make it clear?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; and yet if the gentleman was present when I made my first statement he will see the difficulty. This is the law as it stands now, and it is perfectly satisfactory; but the joint committee, as I have said, saw that there had been $800 extra compensation for a number of years, and they want to eliminate that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says that it is the law now. Does he wish to make that broad statement in view of the fact that in the proposed amendment he adds "each regular session of Congress"?

Mr. BARNHART. That is what we sought to do to prevent the possibility of misunderstanding along the very lines that I have been talking. The language of this has been submitted to the comptroller and he approved it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I listened to the gentleman when he gave the reasons for changing the language from the annual to the present method. I think it would add to the clearness to adhere to the language in the bill rather than substitute the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BARNHART. This was offered at the suggestion of the comptroller and the committee accepted it. It was suggested by authorities higher up that it be changed so as to be beyond question whether an additional sum might be allowed or demanded by the joint committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not see where you could demand an additional salary if you adhere to the language as it is in the bill.

Mr. BARNHART. That does not eliminate the difficulty and the possibility of some committee at some time asking some man to do all the work during the fall and winter when directories are compiled and then discharging him and putting some political henchman on for the balance of the year with nothing to do. That was the purpose of the change in language, and nothing else.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman knows that that would only be a very rare contingency.

Mr. BARNHART. The committee thought it would strengthen the bill, and so prepared the amendment, and I have offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division to see whether there are any economists in the House.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(4) Digest and Manual of the House of Representatives: Provided, That the House of Representatives shall print and bind as many copies as it may desire, even though the cost thereof may exceed $500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a brief inquiry. What is the purpose of carrying in both paragraphs the limitation as to the limit of cost? I know it is existing law, but I can not see the purpose of carrying it into permanent law.

Mr. BARNHART. The law limits a House resolution to $500.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a provision for the Senate Manual and the House Manual.

Mr. BARNHART. If a simple resolution of the House provided a document that the House wanted and needed, it might authorize the publication of more than $500 worth without asking the Senate to concur. It is a matter wholly within the discretion of the House, and is the present law and has worked very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(10) Annual Report of the Comptroller of the Currency, Department of the Treasury: Provided, That when the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency upon the national banks and banks under State and Territorial laws is completed or while it is in process of completion, if thereby the business may be sooner dispatched, the work of printing shall be commenced under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the whole shall be printed and ready for delivery on or before the 1st day of December next after the close of the year to which the report relates: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to print not to exceed 10,000 copies for distribution by the Treasury Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman whether that authorization to the Secretary of the Treasury to print 10,000 additional copies is existing law?

Mr. BARNHART. It is an increase of 3,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that the reason for the increase is to provide additional copies for the increasing number of banks.

Mr. BARNHART. That is the purpose of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

(13) Publications of the Public Health Service, Department of the Treasury: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to print not to exceed 4,000 copies of the Annual Report of the Public Health Service for distribution by the Treasury Department: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to print not to exceed 5,000 copies in any one fiscal year of each of the Bulletins of the Hygienic Laboratory, not exceeding 10 in number in any one fiscal year, and of the Yellow Fever Institute of the Public Health Service of the United States, not exceeding five in number in any one fiscal year: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to print other publications of the Public Health Service and extracts therefrom in such numbers as he may deem for the best interest of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "4,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "10,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 82, line 7, strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the Treasury Department is now permitted to print 4,000 copies of the annual report of the Public Health Service each year. Those 4,000 copies do not nearly supply the demand for this publication. It is of a good deal of interest. It is on the subject of public health, and it is gotten out annually, and it seems to me the number that is printed ought to be increased and that we ought to print more of these reports. I know that since I have been a Member of the House I have had difficulty in securing a sufficient number of these reports to supply those who want to read them to know what has been done by the Public Health Service in the past year, and I think it is of importance that we should have more of these reports printed for distribution among the people. It has been only a short time, a year or two, since the scope of the Public Health Service was enlarged so that they are now able to print certain bulletins that are distributed to Members, which are received possibly once a week, and which can be sent out not only to the physicians but to the public generally. I think that it is of a good deal of importance in the matter of hygiene and health that we should have these publications distributed among the people. I think we could do no better work, so far as this bill is concerned, than to increase the number of the publications gotten out by the Public Health Service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the Secretary of the Treasury have that authority under the proviso in the last paragraph, which gives him unlimited discretion to print other publications of the public service in such numbers as he may deem necessary for the best interest of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not. This refers to such bulletins as he may be allowed a certain allotment of money to print, but it has been the law, so far as I understand it, that the Secretary can permit the Director of the Public Health Service to print 4,000 copies of the annual report, and that he is limited and has always been limited to that number. Is not that correct?

Mr. BARNHART. That is the present law.

Mr. FOSTER. This does not increase it.

Mr. BARNHART. No. I think I can explain the matter satisfactorily to the gentleman from Illinois. So far as the committee is concerned, and so far as I as chairman of that committee am concerned, I want to indorse everything that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has said. I have always been in favor of furnishing to the people of my district everything possible that may contribute to their health and general comfort, and I believe that as a matter of education we could not go too far in distributing bulletins and publications to rising generations that will equip them or afford them with the largest means of health and prosperity possible; but in this instance, while the intention of the gentleman is good, I want to call his attention to the fact that this merely provides that the same amount of publications shall be published as now, and without any resolution in the Congress reprints may be furnished by the superintendent of documents; also if the gentleman from Illinois or myself—and I shall avail myself of the privilege very largely—chooses to take such bulletins from the superintendent of documents, rather than the geological surveys and the vast number of publications which we can not use, then we can get all we want and have them charged to our allotments. We submitted this to the Health Service and to the Treasury, and there was no objection. In fact, there was approval of the plan, and I trust that the gentleman will see the economy and efficiency of permitting it to stand as it is, although the few additional copies, it is true, would be inconsequential in cost.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that it would not cost a great deal more to print this additional number and have the whole report together. I hope the gentleman will not oppose the amendment, because I think it is important enough to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(17) Annual report to Congress of the Commissioner of Patents, without list of patents and patentees, Department of the Interior: Provided, That section 494 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire what is the purpose of the committee in recommending the repeal of section 494 of the Revised Statutes? I notice that that section requires the Commissioner of Patents to make an annual report, giving a detailed statement of all moneys received for patents and copies of patents and the like—an account of his administration of that bureau. This provision repeals that section.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, he is under obligations to make a fiscal report to the Congress just the same as now. The purpose of this is to get rid of this voluminous document, that is of practically no use to anyone. It is a long list of patents and publications that no living man ever takes the time, probably, to go through. It has been published year after year, and it accumulates in large numbers. The Commissioner of Patents has asked that this action be taken; and I think the gentleman, under those conditions, will appreciate the importance of the amendment. The report is printed in another form—more condensed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course I can understand how it would be of no interest to Members of Congress, but I thought that perhaps it might be of some interest to practitioners before the Patent Office. The gentleman is quite certain that he will continue to make his account of moneys received in regular form?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, yes; he would have to do that to the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there are a dozen men here, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-one gentlemen are present—not a quorum—and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15902, and finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called; whereupon 264 Members responded to their names—a quorum—and he reported the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The Clerk read as follows:

(18) United States maps, Department of the Interior: Provided, That United States maps prepared in the General Land Office may be mounted with rollers ready for use for congressional valuation distribution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, on last Monday, when the Philippine bill was under discussion, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] declined to be interrupted by his colleague, Mr. GORDON——

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. BARNHART. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Florida if his remarks pertain to the bill in hand?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, just let me have five minutes.

Mr. BARNHART. Do not spring something on us that will take up a lot of time, otherwise I shall have to ask for the regular order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in declining the gentleman used this language:

I can not allow anybody to interrupt me who has absolutely no regard for what he says.

In the same column of the RECORD in discussing what has been called the "grandfather clause"——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to have it understood, if the gentleman is going to speak extensively——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Five minutes is all I desire.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). On what the gentleman from Ohio said I shall insist that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] shall have an equal amount of time in which to reply.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been under consideration for a long time, and I am anxious to get through with it. The very fact is that if the gentleman from Florida is allowed to speak on a topic other than that under consideration, other Members will be entitled to the same privilege, and I trust the gentleman will not insist upon it at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will yield to me——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent to allow the Member from Florida to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Florida may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in the same column of the RECORD the gentleman used this language in discussing the "grandfather clause," as it has come to be known with relation to certain States:

Take the State of Florida, with 204,000 men of voting age; nearly half of them are of the black race. That means that out of the 204,000, over 102,000 have the right to participate in the government so far as the rights of electors are concerned. But when you take the actual vote as cast in an actual election, there is not as large a vote in the whole State by at least one-half as will be cast in my district in November.

I want to submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is a very clear intimation in the gentleman's remarks that some sort of "grandfather clause" obtains in the Florida constitution. I am not here to apologize for "grandfather clauses," because I believe any act is justifiable when it has for its object the rule of the intelligent and virtuous of any community; but I am here to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is absolutely no disfranchisement of anybody in the laws of the State of Florida. We have what is known as a poll-tax prerequisite. The sum of $1 a year is to be paid by every man, of whatever color he may be, as a poll tax, which goes into a school fund; and if at the election it appears that for the two years immediately preceding such election his poll taxes have not been paid he can not vote——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In just a moment. Then, Mr. Chairman, we have the Australian ballot in its purity and in its simplicity. We have no symbols by which an ignorant person can make a mark in a circle and thus vote an entire ticket.

The names of the candidates, without regard to party, are arranged alphabetically, without a symbol of any character, and a man must know how to read in order to vote for candidates of his choice.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am glad to yield, of course.

Mr. FESS. As to the reference to the poll tax, before one votes he must satisfy the election officials that he has paid his poll tax, and that satisfaction is by the receipt?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That is one method that I think you ought to make plain here. That likely would be difficult to do.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Why would it be difficult to do?

Mr. FESS. Because usually, or frequently, people do not carry receipts around with them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. You do not have to produce your receipt unless your name does not appear on the list as having paid the tax. All the names of those who have paid appear; but if by accident or by mistake some name does not appear, then the voter is challenged, and he produces his receipt. And I want to say that any man in any State who is not willing to pay $1 a year for the school fund of his State ought not to be allowed to vote, whether he is black or white. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, one thing further——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Just a moment. The gentleman stated we would not poll half the vote in the whole State of Florida that he would poll in his district. In the last election there were thirty-six thousand and some hundred votes polled in the gentleman's district. In the general election of 1912 in the State of Florida there were over 44,000 votes polled for Members of Congress; but in the primary, which really determines it, there were in the neighborhood of 65,000 votes polled in the State of Florida. The gentleman charges his colleague with not having due regard for veracity, and right on the heel of it shows such a reckless disregard for the truth as to make these two statements, which he could have found out were untrue by only a few moments of investigation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And, again, the population of Florida of men over voting age is 214,195. Of whites there are 124,311, and of negroes only 89,659, a clear majority of white voters of over 35,000 men. In addition, we have 225 of Chinese and other races.

We do not have to do anything unfair or unjust to defeat this black horde and to prevent their controlling our State affairs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I ask it for him, too, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. The statement in the RECORD is an incorrect one, due to my own——

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Ignorance.

Mr. FESS. Not ignorance, but inadvertence in not making the correction that was made here upon the floor. I presume that I am more ignorant than you are, but I beg your pardon for not being quite as gentlemanly as you are. I made the statement on the floor here, in reference to the State of Florida, that you do not cast as many votes as any two districts in my State that I could name. That is the statement I made on the floor here.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is not the record. Why did not the gentleman correct it before he let it go to print?

Mr. FESS. Let me explain. I looked up the vote after the utterance was made, and was surprised to find that your vote in 1912 was less than 40,000, according to the World Almanac.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman permit me just a moment?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If the gentleman will examine the returns of 1912 he will see that the three congressional districts voted over 44,000 and the vote for President was over 51,000.

Mr. FESS. And you have upon the floor here how many Congressmen?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We have four now, under the last apportionment.

Mr. FESS. You have four Congressmen?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. To each Congressman that would be less than 10,000 votes at the election?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I beg your pardon.

Mr. FESS. According to the statement in the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will say to the gentleman that in the primary in 1912 there were over 25,000 Democratic votes cast in my district.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How many votes were cast in the election? You did not give it in the directory.

Mr. FESS. I want to be fair in this matter. I do not want to be regarded as my friend from Florida has regarded me, as making a statement without any reference to its accuracy. I made the statement that there was a very small vote in your State and that I could name two districts in my own State that cast more votes than your entire State. That statement is true. The statement that is in the RECORD was meant to be one and a half of the vote in my district. It should have stated your entire vote will not exceed by one-half the vote which my district will cast next November. The truth is that by your own figures of 51,000 your entire State cast less than a thousand votes more than were cast in 1912 in the counties that make up my new district, which cast 50,621 votes in 1912 and will cast more than that next November. But that does not change the issue between us. If you mean that the colored man votes the same in your State that he does in my State and in other States north of the Ohio River you certainly are misinterpreting the situation. Now, secondly, you are living under the Constitution, the fourteenth amendment of which says that whenever the right to vote is denied to any male citizen of 21 years or over the basis of representation in this House shall be reduced in that State. Thus denying in proportion that those denied hold to the whole voting population, out of a voting population of 204,000, according to your statement, only 51,000 vote, or one in four. The denial to the colored man his suffrage has certainly been done, yet representation has not been reduced. And you certainly do not mean that you do not deny the right to vote to certain citizens in your State, do you?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I absolutely do. I absolutely do deny that any man in the State of Florida who pays his poll taxes to the educational fund and who can read a ticket is denied the right to vote.

Mr. FESS. And that reading is not a reading of a ticket, but the reading and interpreting the constitution of his State, as is the case of other States in the South.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all. There is not a word about the constitution in it.

Mr. FESS. Then you are different from Alabama, which State I was discussing when I employed the term "grandfather clause," which is a part of its constitution.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That may be; but I want to say this to the gentleman, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman should recognize that the State of Florida is a very small State. The State of Ohio is a very large State. You are more thickly populated. But we are the largest State in point of area east of the Mississippi, except one; but we have not the population.

Mr. FESS. You have over a million and a half.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No, sir. The last census gave us about three quarters of a million.

Mr. FESS. Yes; about 750,000. It was South Carolina that has the million and a half, and it was another State I was examining upon this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(19) Publications of the Bureau of Education, Department of the Interior: Provided, That said publications shall be published in such editions as may be recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, but not to exceed 10,000 copies for the first edition: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to print not to exceed 20,000 copies of the Annual Report of the Commissioner of Education for distribution by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. Is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] present, or did he leave?

A MEMBER. He is here.

Mr. WILSON of Florida. I simply wanted to say that I put in a hasty remark here a moment ago when I said that the gentleman's statement was due to ignorance. I did not mean ignorance. I should have stated "a misunderstanding of the facts," and I want to apologize to the gentleman if I offended him in any way. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I recognize that this is always a habit of my distinguished and amiable friend from Florida; and not only is it his habit, but that of every other man that I have ever heard speak from the sections that I have been discussing; that with them the mark of perfect gentlemanliness has always been present, so far as I know. I thought the gentleman's statement was a slip that he did not mean, and I resented it a little, and I beg the gentleman's pardon for the manner in which I spoke a moment ago. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk, to be inserted after the word "edition," in line 24, page 83.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 83, line 24, after the word "edition," insert "and not more than that number for a subsequent edition."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the Committee on Printing will agree that there should be some limitation on the discretion of the bureau chief in the reprint of subsequent editions, and not permit him to continue reprinting subsequent editions ad infinitum. The amendment that I sent to the Clerk's desk would restrict the publication to a second edition.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman's amendment limit that to 10,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. I intend to follow that up by making that 25,000 or a greater number.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, this resolves itself back to the same proposition that we had before. This is a publication that now comes to the folding room if so ordered printed. The valuation account is based upon the publications that have been issued by this bureau from year to year. The bureau is given a publication account. They ask for the number that they think they can use, and we give them what they ask.

Now, if Congress decides that this is not sufficient, then the joint committee, of course, will print and make available all of the publications they want, to be charged up to the valuation account. However, we have a limitation, and the limitation is that the bureau can publish only one edition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. The provision provides that there shall not be more than 10,000 copies of the first edition, without any limitation whatever upon subsequent editions.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, if it should develop now that a larger number than 10,000 might be demanded by the membership of the House and Senate, and that a larger edition should be printed, it would be cheaper to print one edition of 20,000 copies than two editions of 10,000 copies each. As a matter of course, under such conditions the gentleman from Wisconsin would not insist that his limitation should prevail.

Mr. STAFFORD. I grant the strength of the position taken by the gentleman, but I was under the impression that this was a provision that provided for the bulletins to be distributed by the bureau itself.

Mr. BARNHART. It does, so far as this one edition is concerned. But after that a reprint is made, and we can only get a reprint by the authority of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will recall that earlier in the session we had this very proposition pending before the committee on a bill reported from the Committee on Education, and, if I mistake not, the committee decided that there should be an edition of 25,000 copies for the first edition and restricting any further publication to an edition of a like number. I was seeking to have the bill pending before the committee conform to the action of the House taken at that time.

Mr. BARNHART. That was on the theory that the present allotment plan should continue; but inasmuch as we allow the Bureau of Education to print an edition of 10,000, it is surmised that will take care of the needs of the bureau, except in cases where Members want copies, and then they will get them from the superintendent of documents.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, it was the consensus of opinion at that time, from the report of the Bureau of Education, that 10,000 copies of these educational bulletins was altogether too small a number for distribution, and that 25,000 copies was the minimum that should be printed in the first edition. I think every Member agreed that 10,000 copies were inadequate to meet the demands of the country for these valuable educational bulletins.

Mr. BARNHART. It would be under the present law, but under the allotment plan it makes no difference how you get it, whether the Printing Office gets the money direct for the printing or whether you get it through the Bureau of Education.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not considering this from the standpoint of the valuation plan so much as I am from the standpoint of the bureau, to enable the bureau to distribute these valuable bulletins throughout the country to meet the demand that exists for them. If you are going to limit the edition to 10,000 copies for the use of the bureau, I think it is too small. The House at that time, after a thorough consideration of the subject, after three or four hours' debate, agreed that the first edition should be 25,000.

I had intended to follow up this amendment with an amendment increasing the edition from 10,000 to 25,000.

Mr. BARNHART. This part of this section was authorized by the Bureau of Education, or was suggested by it when the bill was submitted to it. It provides that it may print additional editions, of course, if it has the money to do it, and it would be in the discretion of the bureau to use its money to print either a small or a large edition. I hardly see how it would be important under this plan. This bill pertaining, as it does, to what is called the folding-room allotment to Members of Congress, it would have nothing to do with enlarging or decreasing the allotment asked for by the bureau and granted by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me ask, for the information of the committee and for my own enlightenment, whether the proviso has any reference to the editions that will be published by the Public Printer to meet the demands of Members of Congress under their allotments.

Mr. BARNHART. None whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the way I construed it.

Mr. BARNHART. He might print an edition of 100,000 if there was sufficient call to justify such an edition, which would make it very much cheaper, and therefore afford very many more bulletins for the Members.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, do I understand that this proviso only seeks to restrict the number to be used by the Bureau of Education?

Mr. BARNHART. That is it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe that 25,000 should be substituted for 10,000? The gentleman will remember that some time ago we considered a bill reported by the Committee on Education, giving to the Bureau of Education ad libitum discretion in the number of bulletins which might be printed. The House after careful consideration of the matter decided very positively that 25,000 should be the number of the first edition, and that there should be a restriction to that number for the second edition. Does not the gentleman think for that reason that 25,000 should be substituted for 10,000?

Mr. BARNHART. I will answer that by saying that that might be true or it might not be true. The Bureau of Education might be overenthusiastic about some publication and print 50,000, and then discover that there was not much demand for it. Stranger things have happened. But the Bureau of Education itself has fixed the limit at 10,000, and it has the privilege and the authority of law to print additional prints in such editions as it sees fit. If they want to make it 25,000, I do not see anything in the bill that would restrict it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Right here you provide that of the first edition there shall not be more than 10,000 copies.

Mr. BARNHART. That is the first edition. The purpose of that is just what I explained. There might be an overenthusiastic estimate, under which a large number of bulletins might be printed, and the demand might not prove to be very great. The gentleman has seen that occur on the floor of the House. I recall that some time ago, when the price of meat went high, some enthusiast here introduced a resolution providing for the publication of hundreds of thousands—and I do not know but it went into the millions—of a bulletin on the cooking and use of meat, and I apprehend that there was not 1 Congressman in 50 who ever sent out all of his allotment of those bulletins.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. To my knowledge there were any number of Congressmen who sent out their full quotas of that bulletin. The gentleman contradicts himself, or else the Bureau of Education contradict their earlier position.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will take the time to inquire of the folding room, he will find an enormous accumulation of those bulletins. I have a good many of them. I remember distinctly that I submitted the bulletin to a lady who I thought was something of an expert cook, and she said she would not send out a bulletin of that kind; that it was an imposition on the time and intelligence of the average cook.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recall the discussion that took place in the House some few months ago in the consideration of the bill that I have just referred to, increasing the number of bulletins that might be used by the Bureau of Education for distribution?

Mr. BARNHART. No; I do not remember it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We had a very heated discussion about that on two Calendar Wednesdays. At that time I remember distinctly that the Commissioner of Education called attention to the fact that 10,000 was altogether too limited an edition to meet the growing demands of the bureau, and insisted that it should be at least 25,000. This is a return to that.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARNHART. I think I can enlighten the gentleman on that. The law originally provided for an edition of 12,500, all told. The Commissioner of Education came in and asked that that be increased to 25,000. Now we start on the basis of giving them 10,000 as a first edition, and then afterwards they may publish additional editions if necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman only states it half correctly. The Commissioner of Education wanted to have 25,000 for his first edition and without limit on subsequent editions. That was the bill reported from the Committee on Education, and the House inserted the further limitation of only permitting him to have printed for his second edition the same number, namely, 25,000. That was the judgment of the House. I should think the gentleman would take the judgment of the House on that matter in connection with this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, to strike out "10," in line 23, page 83, and substitute "25."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 83, line 23, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five."

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 19.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it is very obvious from the last vote that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the chairman of the Committee on Printing kindly move that the committee rise?

Mr. BARNHART. No; I will not move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). Fifty-two Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 15902, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and 232 Members responded to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

(20) Publications of the Geological Survey, except maps, folios, and atlases, Department of the Interior: Provided, That the said publications shall consist of the annual report of the director, which shall be confined to one volume of octavo size; monographs and professional papers, of quarto size; bulletins, of octavo size; report on the mineral resources of the United States, which shall be published in not to exceed two volumes of octavo size, separate chapters of which on any given mineral product may be printed in pamphlet editions on request of the Director of the Geological Survey, approved by the Secretary of the Interior; water-supply papers, of octavo size; and topographic and geologic maps, folios, and atlases: Provided further, That two copies of each map and atlas shall be placed at the disposal of each Senator, Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, if published within his term, and that not to exceed 500 copies of each map and atlas shall be distributed gratuitously among foreign Governments and departments of our own Government, to literary and scientific associations, and to such educational institutions and libraries as may be designated by the Director of the Geological Survey and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Department of the Interior is authorized to sell the maps and atlases prepared and published by the Geological Survey at the cost of paper and printing, as fixed by the Director of the Survey and approved by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may authorize the printing of any of the publications of the Geological Survey, including separate chapters on mineral resources, but excluding the annual report of the director, in such number as he may deem for the best interest of the Government, for distribution by the Department of the Interior; of the annual report of the director, not to exceed 4,000 copies shall be printed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the proviso on page 84, line 24, that the words "Department of the Interior" are used, and in every other case the words "Secretary of the Interior." I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he wants to use the words in one case and not in the other?

Mr. BARNHART. I think that ought to be corrected. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, I move that, in line 24, the word "Department" be stricken out and the word "Secretary" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 84, line 24, strike out the word "Department" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Secretary."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I noted the suggestion made by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and the query came into my mind whether you do not wish to leave this to the department or some bureau chief. I direct attention to the same phraseology on line 9, page 85, which reads "for distribution by the Department of the Interior." In that particular you would not wish to have the phraseology changed to "Secretary."

Mr. BARNHART. I think it would be better to use the word "Secretary," in line 24, page 84, and I trust that the amendment may be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in line 9, page 85, I think the word "Department" should be stricken out and the word "Secretary" inserted. I offer that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 85, line 9, strike out the word "Department" and insert the word "Secretary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Farmers' bulletins: Provided, That such bulletins shall be adapted to the interests of the farmers of the different sections of the country: Provided further, That on and after September 4, 1914, no copies of farmers' bulletins shall be printed for distribution except as authorized by this act, but each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be entitled to distribute the bulletins that may then be to his credit with the Department of Agriculture, and four-fifths of the amount available at that time for the specific purpose of printing farmers' bulletins of the allotment for printing and binding for the Department of Agriculture shall thereupon be transferred and credited to the allotment for printing and binding for Congress.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 86, line 16, after the word "after," strike out "September" and insert in lieu thereof the word "March."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 86, line 16, after the word "and," strike out the word "fourteen" and insert the word "fifteen."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the real intent of this proviso. As I understand, under existing law the department has one-fifth of the farmers' bulletins now printed for distribution, as the Secretary sees fit. This proviso would seek to discontinue the available one-fifth of those publications at his command.

Mr. BARNHART. That was not the intention. It discontinues the four-fifths and leaves him the one-fifth that he now has for the balance of the fiscal year. The purpose was to give the Secretary of Agriculture the bulletins that he is now entitled to for his own distribution.

Mr. STAFFORD. I call the gentleman's attention to the following language in the proviso:

Provided further, That on and after March 4, 1915, no copies of farmers' bulletins shall be printed for distribution except as authorized by this act.

Where will there be any authority in the Secretary of Agriculture to obtain those farmers' bulletins which he now distributes if you carry that phraseology? Under existing law, as the gentleman knows, there is a provision for distribution by the Secretary of one-fifth of the allotment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will refer back to page 85, paragraph 22, he will find the general authorization there for the Secretary of Agriculture to print such number of copies of reports and bulletins, containing not more than 100 octavo pages each, and of his annual report for distribution by the Department of Agriculture, as he shall deem for the best interest of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is an introductory paragraph to the various subdivisions which follow, which enumerate the various character of publications, and the second subdivision is farmers' bulletins. In the provision we are now considering you absolutely repeal, in the language that I have pointed out, all authority for printing any additional farmers' bulletins. That phraseology would certainly refer to the farmers' bulletins authorized now for distribution by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BARNHART. I would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if it would not make it clearer if, after the word "distribution," in line 17, we inserted the words "by Members of Congress."

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of the proviso at all? Does it accomplish anything except to meet the temporary conditions which will confront the department when this law goes into effect, as far as farmers' bulletins are concerned?

Mr. BARNHART. The purpose intended was that the department might use its one-fifth, but could not use all of the other. Really, I do not see, if it takes effect in the future—next March—that it makes any difference if we entirely eliminate it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not strike out the proviso entirely? That would remove all ambiguity and all doubt.

Mr. BARNHART. The trouble would be that, instead of a new, incoming Member of Congress having available four-fifths of the documents that had been transferred to the superintendent of documents, the Department of Agriculture would have the use of them until the beginning of the fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the existing practice Members of Congress are entitled to the quota already provided, which will expire at the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1915.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman thinks best to make the motion to strike it out, the committee will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest that the gentleman better first withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his amendment, without objection, and the gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 86, line 15, strike out the remainder of the paragraph beginning with the words "Provided further."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 86, at the end of line 26, add the following: "Provided further, That there be collected, assembled, and bound into a single volume the bulletins of the Department of Agriculture on cooking and domestic science, the volume to be entitled 'Uncle Sam's Cook Book'; and that of these volumes there shall be printed 200,000 copies, 140,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 60,000 for the use of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(h) Annual Report of the Beet Sugar Industry in the United States, Department of Agriculture: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to print and distribute annually not to exceed 8,000 copies of the said annual report covering the progress of the beet-sugar industry in the United States: Provided further, That the preparation and publication of such annual reports shall be within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 88, following line 5, insert as a new paragraph:

"(i) Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle and Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse, Department of Agriculture: Provided, That whenever necessary the same shall be revised and brought to date under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(23) Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance, Department of Commerce: Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to print not to exceed 4,000 copies for distribution by the Department of Commerce.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment until I offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Very well.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 88, line 6, after the word "Commerce," strike out the words "and Finance."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understand the paragraph under consideration is subsection 24. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the real need of having a publication of the reports on foreign commerce and navigation?

Mr. BARNHART. Well, Mr. Chairman, I can hardly answer that except to say that in the preparation of this bill these matters, item by item, were taken up by the authorities, and such publications were eliminated as they reported no calls for, but in order to make the bill broad enough and in order to take care of every possible contingency we left that in; but, of course, if there is no demand for them there will be no printing of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be certainly the first printing.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; there will be the first printing.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they may become a drug on the shelves of the department.

Mr. BARNHART. There will be no printing unless they are authorized by the Joint Committee on Printing, as a matter of course, and there would be no authorization by the Joint Committee on Printing unless there should be a demand from the membership of the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether any Member has ever availed himself of these annual reports, comprising, as I recall, a lot of statistical information of very little value when printed. I thought it of such a character that it could be purposely eliminated from the bill.

Mr. BARNHART. It is possible it would never be called for. If it should be, the department has already the printing and the plates, and it would give Members an opportunity under the valuation plan, and there might be a change in conditions ensue by which there would be a revision of the form of it, and eventually it might become more valuable. It will certainly incur no expense unless there is a demand for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is an expense in the compilation of the large tome which the gentleman has in his hand.

Mr. BARNHART. The department will issue these on its own account. This publication is by the Department of Commerce, and they will continue to issue it as a part of their appropriation. If they do not, of course there could be no reprint.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 68. PAR. 5. Copies of Government publications subject to distribution under this section shall be printed promptly when the same shall be ready for publication, and shall be bound in paper or cloth, as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the next paragraph carries a provision that will be of interest to each Member of the House and inasmuch as the committee feels that it ought to be taken up at a time when there is a larger representation than there is now, and as there is no disposition upon the part of the committee to make the point of no quorum, I am going to ask that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15902 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13811. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolutions:

H. J. Res. 335. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved July 21, 1914;

H. J. Res. 339. Joint resolution to correct an error in H. R. 12914; and

H. J. Res. 342. Joint resolution to correct an error in H. R. 12914.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House meets on Friday next I may address the House for one hour on the subject of the cotton situation in the South.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House meets on Friday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the clearing of the Speaker's table, and conference reports, he shall be permitted to address the House for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman concede the right to somebody from districts representing shoe manufactories and machinery manufactories, all of which need to be upheld and the products placed in warehouses on account of not being sold——

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not object to anybody speaking whose products are affected as we are on account of the war.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like very much to see all of those things taken care of by the Government, if that question is to be——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will couple with his request that some person on this side shall have the right to speak, for one I shall not object; otherwise I shall.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object to my request to present my views. I am not trying to get time for somebody else to present views. I want to present my views on this question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will realize there is no opportunity for Members on this side at the present time to enter into general debate on matters pertaining to the welfare of the country. All we ask is that we be given a like time on this side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the gentleman on that side will ask for somebody to speak an hour, I will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD Embody in your request that somebody on this side be allowed to speak an hour on general subjects.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to state to the gentleman that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] spoke 50 minutes on this subject, and there was no objection to it, and the other gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] spoke 10 minutes. I did not agree with the views they expressed to some extent. I want a chance to speak on this cotton industry. There are 30,000,000 people dependent on this industry, and I want to speak concerning it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection if you will couple with your request that some Member on this side shall have an hour to speak on some subject.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know that you have anyone who wants an hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are plenty of them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, October 1, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting, in accordance with the provisions of an act approved March 4, 1913, annual report of the United States Express Co. SENATE.

THURSDAY, October 1, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, September 28, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was diverted last evening from the line of argument which I was attempting to make. I do not desire to take too much of the time of the Senate, so I shall ask generally at this time that I may be permitted to insert in my remarks some quotations from decisions from which I had intended to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Borah	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Bryan	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.	Weeks
Chamberlain	Oliver	Smoot	West
Chilton	Overman	Sterling	White
Clapp	Page	Swanson	Williams
Culberson	Perkins	Thompson
Gore	Pittman	Thornton
Kern	Reed	Townsend

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] are necessarily absent. The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CLARK]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I make this statement for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SHEPPARD, and Mr. THOMAS answered to their names when called.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, and Mr. LANE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. BANKHEAD, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on important business.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. LEE of Maryland, Mr. NELSON, Mr. JAMES, Mr. OWEN, Mr. MYERS, and Mr. NORRIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is my purpose now to call attention to the decisions in the cases known as the Standard Oil and the Tobacco cases and to some opinions which followed in the wake of those opinions, so that we may see how thoroughly the court has dealt with this subject, which is not only of concern to the people but a matter of consideration in the Senate. Everyone looked upon the approaching decisions in the Standard Oil case and in the Tobacco case as likely to be conclusive as to the final and settled construction of the Sherman antitrust law.

It was felt, Mr. President, that if these combinations and trusts were dissolved by the Supreme Court and it was found that the Sherman law was sufficient and efficient to deal with such combinations as those the statute would thereafter be regarded as effective for the great purpose for which it was enacted. On the other hand, it was believed that the case against these combinations would be the real test as to the efficiency of this law and that if they should escape the condemnation of the statute it would be wholly ineffective thereafter.

For a time after the rendition of these decisions it was believed that the court had read into the statute a phrase which would likely render the statute thereafter, in large measure, effective; but, as public opinion settled down and it came to be known that these decisions had really condemned every conceivable form of monopoly against which the people have ever complained, as the decisions came to be better and more fully understood, the country arrived at the conclusion that the Sherman antitrust law had become a great, powerful, effective statute.

I quote a single paragraph from the body of the Standard Oil decision, found in Two hundred and twenty-first United States, at page 59, wherein it is said:

> That in view of the many new forms of contracts and combinations which were being evolved from existing economic conditions, it was deemed essential by an all-embracing enumeration to make sure that no form of contract or combination by which an undue restraint of interstate or foreign commerce was brought about could save such restraint from condemnation. The statute under this view evidenced the intent not to restrain the right to make and enforce contracts, whether resulting from combination or otherwise, which did not unduly restrain interstate or foreign commerce, but to protect that commerce from being restrained by methods, whether old or new, which would constitute an interference that is an undue restraint.

Every conceivable form of contract or combination arising out of economic conditions, new or old, and every form of monopoly of the ten thousand different subtle forms in which it might appear was adjudged to be within the inhibition of the statute, provided it affected unduly interstate commerce, or provided that it built up a monopoly or was a step in the direction of building up a monopoly.

It is well to bear in mind, Mr. President, that the word "unreasonable" can have effect only upon the first section of the Sherman antitrust law; that as to the second section, which deals with monopoly, the court condemned all conceivable forms of monopoly, and, furthermore, inhibited and condemned every step which would lead to the formation of a monopoly. There is no act which would be considered or regarded as tending to build up a monopoly that is not now inhibited by the Sherman antitrust law, and you may go into a court of equity and prevent that single act from being accomplished or achieved if its tendency be to build up a monopoly, or if it be a step in that direction. There could be no more complete condemnation of monopoly, which is the real evil from which the country is suffering, than is found in these decisions. The court says further:

> Undoubtedly the words "to monopolize" and "monopolize" as used in the section reach every act bringing about the prohibited results. The ambiguity, if any, is involved in determining what is intended by "monopolize." But this ambiguity is readily dispelled in the light of the previous history of the law of restraint of trade to which we have referred and the indication which it gives of the practical evolution by which monopoly and the acts which produce the same result as monopoly—that is, an undue restraint of the course of trade—all came to be spoken of as, and to be, indeed, synonymous with, restraint of trade. In other words, having by the first section forbidden all means of monopolizing trade—that is, unduly restraining it by means of every contract, combination, etc.—the second section seeks, if possible, to make the prohibitions of the act all the more complete and perfect by embracing all attempts to reach the end prohibited by the first section—that is, restraints of trade, by any attempt to monopolize, or monopolizations thereof—even although the acts by which such results are attempted to be brought about or are brought about be not embraced within the general enumeration of the first section.

Mr. President, there is no escape from the principle there announced, and now constituting the final decision and the final judgment of the court with reference to this statute. All forms of monopoly, all steps leading to monopoly, all acts in contemplation of monopoly, are prohibited, as well as the final result, to wit, a monopoly. There is not in this bill a specification or condemnation of any individualized act which can be considered as tending to create monopoly which is not now condemned by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil case; and the thing we are seeking to reach in this country is the eradication and elimination of monopoly in its different forms.

I have never felt that there was any great necessity for the Congress or the lawmaking body to provide for the surveillance or the overseeing or the superintending of the different forms of contest or industrial war which characterize generally the business world, unless they are acts which in themselves can create monopoly. If so, they stand under the ban of the law as it is now written.

Permit me now to call attention to a paragraph in the American Tobacco Co. case. The court says:

Coming then to apply to the case before us the act as interpreted in the Standard Oil and previous cases, all the difficulties suggested by the mere form in which the assailed transactions are clothed become of no moment.

It is well known, and the briefs disclose, that the attorneys presenting the Tobacco case felt that the form in which the combination had been organized or which it had taken, the manner in which the different independent industries had been brought together, the method by which one corporation had practically absorbed all the others, and the scheme by which they were interlocked and intertwined and covered and blanketed by stock issues and bond issues, would enable them to say, "We are simply a great industry—not a combination, but a great industry, grown up through and by legitimate methods, and are entitled to be protected under the law." But the court looked through these forms. As a court of equity will, it pierced through the outer covering and looked to the ultimate object, intent, purpose, and power of the combination as made; and, looking through the form, it saw within from the beginning an intent to monopolize the industry, to control it exclusively, if possible, or so nearly exclusively as to enable it to dominate the industrial field in that particular line. Having arrived at the conclusion that it was a monopoly, the court said it was indifferent as to the form which the assailed transactions took. The court further said:

This follows because, although it was held in the Standard Oil case that—giving to the statute a reasonable construction—the words "restraint of trade" did not embrace all those normal and usual contracts essential to individual freedom and the right to make which were necessary in order that the course of trade might be free, yet, as a result of the reasonable construction which was affixed to the statute, it was pointed out that the generic designation of the first and second sections of the law, when taken together, embraced every conceivable act which could possibly come within the spirit or purpose of the prohibitions of the law, without regard to the garb in which such acts were clothed. That is to say, it was held that, in view of the general language of the statute and the public policy which it manifested, there was no possibility of frustrating that policy by resorting to any disguise or subterfuge of form, since resort to reason rendered it impossible to escape by any indirection the prohibitions of the statute.

Mr. President, what form of monopoly or what monopolistic practice can the most ingenious mind now conceive that is not subject to condemnation and dissolution under this law? As I said yesterday, as the business world interpreted this decision, they soon came to know that there was no possible escape from the decision of the Supreme Court. They fought earnestly, up until this decision was rendered, for some gap out of which they might go or escape; but since the hour this decision was rendered there has not been, to my knowledge, a combination or monopoly created or built up in the industrial world. I have never doubted that had it been said, either by the party then in power or the party now in power, that this decision in all its specifications and its strength and comprehensiveness would be enforced, so far as any new combination was concerned the industrial world need not fear it in the future.

We have been 20 years in building up these decisions. It takes time to build up a great code of law to circumvent the ingenuity of those who desire to evade principles and policies. There is no court and no body of lawmakers which can in the first instance define all the different methods by which men will seek to escape a general principle announced; but in the 20 years which have passed the court has dealt with one combination after another, until in these decisions are found a code of rules, of principles, which seem now to cover every conceivable form of transaction having for its purpose the creation of a monopoly.

Finally, Mr. President, what does the Supreme Court say in the Tobacco case? I doubt if the purport or the strength of this judgment has ever been understood or its real weight properly regarded by the public. It says—this is the judgment of dissolution—

That in the event, before the expiration of the period thus fixed, a condition of distintegration in harmony with the law is not brought about, either as the consequence of the action of the court in determining an issue on the subject or in accepting a plan agreed upon, it shall be the duty of the court, either by way of an injunction restraining the movement of the products of the combination in the channels of interstate or foreign commerce or by the appointment of a receiver, to give effect to the requirements of the statute.

I will venture to say that there will not be found in the history of chancery in England or in this country any such decree as is here found in the Tobacco case, so drastic and so effective that there could be no possible escape. The court lays down the rule that if the defendants violate the law or fail to bring themselves within the provisions of the law they shall be prohibited from enjoying the benefit of interstate trade and denied entrance to the channels of interstate commerce.

Mr. President, there is a complete and efficient program by means of which we can deal with this subject. First, every form of monopoly, in whatever guise it may robe itself, is condemned. Second, the condemnation may take the form of providing that it shall not enter the channels of interstate trade at all.

There was one other attempt, after the rendition of this opinion, to break through. Those who had formulated the gigantic scheme in Chicago and elsewhere to corner the market, as it was known, conceived the idea that they were not within the inhibition of the statute; that cornering the market was a transaction wholly within the State, and did not come within the purview of interfering with interstate trade; and the court had occasion in the case of United States v. Patten (226 U. S.) to pass upon this question. In determining it the court said:

We come, then, to the question whether a conspiracy to run a corner in the available supply of a staple commodity, such as cotton, normally a subject of trade and commerce among the States, and thereby to enhance artificially its price throughout the country and to compel all who have occasion to obtain it to pay the enhanced price or else to leave their needs unsatisfied, is within the terms of section 1 of the antitrust act, which makes it a criminal offense to "engage in" a "conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States." The circuit court, as we have seen, answered the question in the negative; and this, although accepting as an allegation of fact, rather than as a mere economic theory of the pleader, the statement in the counts that interstate trade and commerce would necessarily be obstructed by the operation of the conspiracy. The reasons assigned for the ruling, and now pressed upon our attention, are (1) that the conspiracy does not belong to the class in which the members are engaged in interstate trade or commerce and agree to suppress competition among themselves; (2) that running a corner, instead of restraining competition, tends, temporarily at least, to stimulate it; and (3) that the obstruction of interstate trade and commerce resulting from the operation of the conspiracy, even although a necessary result, would be so indirect as not to be a restraint in the sense of the statute.

Upon careful reflection we are constrained to hold that the reasons given do not sustain the ruling and that the answer to the question must be in the affirmative.

So long, sir, as it seemed possible to find an avenue of escape from the Sherman antitrust law our attention was directed to the attacks which were being made upon that law; but when the time arrived that every possible avenue seemed to be closed against the activities of those who would create monopolies, a different line of action was adopted and a new policy undertaken to be fastened upon the country. As I said yesterday, as soon as that condition of affairs arose there began a propaganda in this country by some acting in perfect good faith, by others with a design to enable them to do that which they were not permitted to do under the Sherman law—create monopoly—and that propaganda has gone forward. What was its purpose? What did it seek to do? To bring the public mind to the belief that these monopolies, notwithstanding they were condemned under the Sherman law, should be permitted, in the interest of business and business growth and evolution, to continue, and merely their practices prohibited by some ruling power, such as a business court or a commission. It was not, Mr. President, that the Sherman law was ineffective, it was that it was effective, that started the propaganda. It was not that it was insufficient, it was that it was sufficient, that started the new theory and the new policy with which we are now dealing.

To my mind, the most reprehensible piece of politics that ever has been practiced upon the public has been this constant attack upon the courts. It was said they had failed to do their duty under the Sherman law and to respond to public opinion with reference to this all-important question. The courts from the beginning, with two single exceptions, both of which exceptions are now eliminated by reason of subsequent decisions, have dealt with this subject in a way that has resulted in a complete code of laws sufficient and efficient to accomplish everything that the most sanguine desire in regard to dealing with this subject. Those who have desired to bring about a commission have apparently felt it necessary to attack the courts and to show that they were incapable of dealing with this subject, in order that it might be more justifiable in the minds of the public that we should find a new tribunal.

But it is said that the law has been made uncertain by reason of the decision in the Standard Oil case and the Tobacco case, and reading into the statute, as they say, "unreasonable restraint of trade"; that it is unenforceable as a criminal statute; that juries are not prepared to determine with sufficient safety and certainty what is unreasonable restraint, even under the instructions of the court; and that the statute has been rendered ineffective as a criminal statute. What does the Supreme Court say in regard to that?

In the case of Nash v. United States (229 U. S.) it is said:

> The two counts before us were demurred to on the grounds that the statute was so vague as to be inoperative on its criminal side.
>
> The objection to the criminal operation of the statute is thought to be waranted by The Standard Oil Co. v. United States (221 U. S., 1) and United States v. American Tobacco Co. (221 U. S., 106). Those cases may be taken to have established that only such contracts and combinations are within the act as, by reason of intent or the inherent nature of the contemplated acts, prejudice the public interests by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the course of trade. And thereupon it is said that the crime thus defined by the statute contains in its definition an element of degree as to which estimates may differ, with the result that a man might find himself in prison, because his honest judgment did not anticipate that of a jury of less competent men. The kindred proposition that "the criminality of an act can not depend upon whether a jury may think it reasonable or unreasonable. There must be some definiteness and certainty," is cited from the late Mr. Justice Brewer, sitting in the circuit court.
> But apart from the common law as to restraint of trade, thus taken up by the statute, the law is full of instances where a man's fate depends on his estimating rightly—that is, as the jury subsequently estimates it—some matter of degree. If his judgment is wrong, not only may he incur a fine or a short imprisonment, as here; he may incur the penalty of death. "An act causing death may be murder, manslaughter, or misadventure, according to the degree of danger attending it," by common experience in the circumstances known to the actor. "The very meaning of the fiction of implied malice in such cases at common law was that a man might have to answer with his life for consequences which he neither intended nor foresaw." "The criterion in such cases is to examine whether common social duty would, under the circumstances, have suggested a more circumspect conduct." If a man should kill another by driving an automobile furiously into a crowd, he might be convicted of murder, however little he expected the result. If he did not more than drive negligently through a street, he might get off with manslaughter or less. And in the last case he might be held, although he himself thought that he was acting as a prudent man should. But without further argument, the case is very nearly disposed of by Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Texas (No. 1) (212 U. S., 86, 109), where Mr. Justice Brewer's decision and other similar ones were cited in vain. We are of opinion that there is no constitutional difficulty in the way of enforcing the criminal part of the act.

For any act, Mr. President, for which any combination would ever be indicted, for any act for which they would ever be brought into a court to be tried for their liberty, there would not be any difficulty in a jury arriving at the question whether or not they had been guilty of a violation of the law; neither would there be any question as to the fact that the parties who were guilty of the act had full knowledge of the fact that they were violating the law when they did so.

When you take the Standard Oil decision and the decision in the Tobacco case and analyze them and pick out those separate and distinct acts by means of which they built up their monopoly and by means of which they put other people out of business, there is not one of those separate and distinct acts that one would not readily say was dishonest. Neither is there one of those acts which any man in the business world could have committed without knowing in his heart that he was doing that which was dishonest, extortionate, and overpowering toward his neighbor or his competitor.

The question of lowering prices for the purpose of putting a competitor out of business while keeping prices up in another part of the country, the question of sending spies to spy upon an independent industry or to foment strikes within an independent industry, the question of purchasing competitors and dismantling projects and putting them out of business are all so flagrant, so open, and such unquestioned acts in violation of the statute that no man guilty of them would have any question at the time of their doing or achievement that he was within the inhibition of the law.

The statute is not only enforceable in a court of equity but it is equally enforceable, in my judgment, in the criminal court. The jury has to deal with reasonable doubt, with degrees in the question of murder, with degrees in the question of negligence, with the question of intent; and in the recovery against corporations, of employees, and coemployees under the instructions of the court the jury may deal with all the different degrees of negligence. It is no different question from that with which they would have to deal here.

Mr. President, there was another question raised with reference to the Sherman antitrust law which was an important one, because it had to do with the question of the statute of limitations. It was argued upon the part of some parties who were brought to answer under this law that the conspiracy became consummated, finished, at a certain time, and therefore a number of these monopolies or combines which had been formed in previous years had come within the inhibition of the statute of limitations so far as any prosecutions of the participants were concerned. It was an important question in the sense that many who had violated the law in some time past might wholly escape, and it was important from another standpoint, and that is, that if the Department of Justice should not discover the evidence within time to prosecute in the short period of three years many of them might escape in the future. But the court said in regard to that question:

> Although mere continuance of result of a crime does not continue the crime itself, if such continuance of result depends upon continuous cooperation of the conspirators, the conspiracy continues until the time of its abandonment or success.

Upon page 607 it is said:

> The defendants argue that a conspiracy is a completed crime as soon as formed, that it is simply a case of unlawful agreement, and that therefore the continuando may be disregarded and a plea is proper to show that the statute of limitations has run. Subsequent acts in pursuance of the agreement may renew the conspiracy or be evidence of a renewal, but do not change the nature of the original offense. So also, it is said, the fact that an unlawful contract contemplates future acts, or that the results of a successful conspiracy endure to a much later date, does not affect the character of the crime.
> The argument, so far as the premises are true, does not suffice to prove that a conspiracy, although it exists as soon as the agreement is made, may not continue beyond the moment of making it. It is true that the unlawful agreement satisfied the definition of the crime, but it does not exhaust it. It also is true, of course, that the mere continuance of the result of a crime does not continue the crime. But when the plot contemplates bringing to pass a continuous result that will not continue without the continuous cooperation of the conspirators to keep it up, and there is such continuous cooperation, it is a perversion of natural thought and of natural language to call such continuous cooperation a cinematographic series of distinct conspiracies, rather than to call it a single one. Take the present case.

Thus the court reviews the facts in the case, holding that the conspiracy continued until they had ceased to enjoy the benefits or privileges of the conspiracy. So long as they were engaged in carrying on or sustaining a monopoly, so long as they were enjoying the fruits of the combination, the conspiracy continued and the statute of limitations did not run.

It is also contended, Mr. President, and it has been stated here upon the floor, that juries will not convict. There was a time when that seemed to be a just criticism of the law, but since the law has been thoroughly defined and these decisions have been rendered, and it is well known what may be done and what may not be done, there has been a distinct change with reference to the action of juries in the matter of convictions.

Under the last administration—and I take that because I have the data gathered in regard to it since the rendition of those decisions—out of 11 criminal prosecutions actually brought to trial before a jury, the jury disagreed in but 2 cases and acquitted the defendants in but 2 other cases. The defendants voluntarily pleaded guilty in 2 cases and in 6 cases the juries convicted individual defendants, who were sentenced by the court to pay fines and in two instances to imprisonment as well as fines.

In addition to the cases specified, two other cases, in which the indictments had been found prior to the last administration, resulted during its term in verdicts of guilty against the individual defendants. In one of these cases the court imposed a fine; in the other both fine and imprisonment were imposed, although the Supreme Court reversed it on the question of error.

I venture to say, Mr. President, that if you will take 11 noted criminal cases in general, where any kind of a crime is charged against the defendant, you will not find any larger per cent of convictions than you find here since the rendition of these opinions in the enforcement of the Sherman law. Indeed, sir, the number of acquittals in murder cases in this country has led many to advocate the doing away with juries entirely, a policy with which I do not agree. I venture to say that you may take any class of criminal cases and you will find the percentage of acquittals and the percentage of disagreements quite as large as you will find during the last six or seven years under the Sherman antitrust law.

In one of these criminal cases, in which there was a jury trial, the distinguished judge who presided used language at the time he was passing the sentence which seems to me so appropriate that I am going to read it. He said:

However much that law has been misunderstood by many because of their ignorance, and misrepresented by others, or charged with uncertainty by designing persons who would cripple it, fearing its application to their own conduct, or for other reasons, it is nevertheless in itself a clear statement of its meaning, and it can not be misunderstood by anyone who really desires to obey it. It contains no standard of conduct other than the standard every fair-minded, reasonably conscientious man applies to his conduct in the various relations of life. It seeks to protect the common right of every citizen, however humble, to enter into any lawful business he chooses and there to exercise such talents as he has—his enterprise, his skill, and such capital as he can command, to lawfully develop, in such ways as his judgment may dictate, his business into a success if he can accomplish it; but if he must fail, to fail whether through want of skill or sufficient enterprise or capital or bad judgment or because of inferiority of product or bad management or misfortune of one kind or another, but not because of ruthless acts of oppression, sometimes final in their very selves, and sometimes through the exercise by competitors of acts amounting almost to physical force, and in some instances amounting to assaults by putting his agents in fear.

The jury in that case had no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion under the instructions of the court.

I want next, Mr. President, to call attention to some decrees which have been entered since the Standard Oil decision, in order to advise the Senate and more particularly the country of the extent to which the courts go in prohibiting every conceivable form of misconduct by these decrees; and no business man need have any trouble at arriving at what course he can properly pursue if he will just give a few hours' attention to these decrees before he starts in upon his enterprise or in his exploitation of his neighbor's business. I take these statements as to the terms of these decrees from an address of ex-Attorney General Wickersham.

In the Pacific Coast Plumbing Supply Association cases 24 corporations and 60 individuals were enjoined. They were enjoined first from combining, and so forth, to prevent manufacturers of plumbing supplies from selling to persons not members of the association or not listed in a blue book published by the association.

They were enjoined—

From publishing any such book.

From publishing any list of manufacturers who had not agreed to sell only to members of the association or to persons listed in the blue book.

From advertising lists of persons in the business who are not members of the association.

From combining to boycott a manufacturer for having sold to persons not members of the association and not listed in the blue book.

From conspiring to prevent persons located in a given territory from purchasing plumbing supplies from manufacturers or other dealers.

From communicating with a manufacturer or dealer to induce him not to sell to persons not members of the association or not conforming to the definition of a jobber given in the blue book.

Take the case of the General Electric Co. They were enjoined—

From fixing prices by agreement.

From maintaining by agreement differentials between lamps which did not in fact differ in quality or efficiency and from allowing discounts based on the aggregate of purchases from different manufacturers.

From making agreements with jobbers, and so forth, under which they could only secure goods manufactured by the General Electric Co. on condition of agreeing to take all other goods manufactured by them.

From making more favorable terms of sale to customers of any rival manufacturer than it at the same time offered to its established trade, with the purpose of driving such rival out of business.

In the Central West Publishing Co. and the Western Newspaper Union cases the injunction was to this effect:

From underselling any competing service, with the intent or purpose of injuring or destroying a competitor.

From sending out traveling men for the purpose or with instructions to influence the customers of the competitors or either of them so as to secure the trade of the customers without regard to the price.

From selling their goods at less than a fair and reasonable price, with the purpose or intent of injuring or destroying the business of a competitor.

From threatening any customer of a competitor with starting a competing plant unless he patronized the defendant.

From threatening the competitors of either one that they must either cease competing with the defendants or sell out to one of the defendants, under threat that unless they did so their business would be destroyed by the establishment of near-by plants to compete with them.

From in any manner, directly or indirectly, causing any person to purchase stock or become interested in the other for the purpose or effect of harassing it with unreasonable demands or inquiries.

From circulating reports injurious to the business of the other.

From persuading customers of competitors to violate contracts made with them by undertaking to indemnify them against loss and damage by reason of so doing, and so on ad infinitum.

Mr. President, I have trespassed upon the time of the Senate to present in mere outline the code of principles which have finally been announced in the decisions by virtue and under the Sherman antitrust law.

There are two ways, Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I was out on a meeting of a committee. I should like to inquire the case from which the Senator was reading just now?

Mr. BORAH. The last case I was reading from is what is known as the Central West Publishing Co. and the Western Newspaper Union case. The other cases from which I read the decree were the General Electric Co. and the Pacific Plumbing Supply Association.

There were two ways in which it might have been possible to have strengthened the Sherman antitrust law. At one time I am frank to say that I was very much in favor of those two methods. I am still in favor of them, but not so enthusiastic as I was, for the reason that it seems to me that the decisions of the Supreme Court have rendered those things largely unnecessary. The decisions have been such as to make it possibly unnecessary to have any of these methods adopted by which it was formerly contemplated we might strengthen the Sherman antitrust law; but I would still, Mr. President, be perfectly willing to give what support I could to statutes which would specifically individualize these different methods of building up monopolies which have been singled out and designated as objectionable by the Supreme Court, putting them in a separate statute, making those particular acts in themselves punishable in case of their commission by anyone, and in that way enable the law to be enforced more expeditiously and with less cost and the punishment made more certain, and perhaps bring more clearly to the mind of the business world the things which the business world might do and might not do.

Secondly, Mr. President, we might have strengthened the Sherman law by making it easier for private individuals to recover under that law; making it less expensive to recover their treble damages. There is no influence or power quite so effective in the enforcement of law as that of the injured private party. A bureau or a department of justice may postpone or procrastinate with reference to the enforcement of statutes, but a man who has suffered an injury, and knows that he has suffered an injury, and sees a speedy remedy for it, a remedy which he can pursue without the fear of bankruptcy, though he be a man of limited means, will almost invariably seek his recovery; and while he is seeking his recovery he is bringing about greater respect for the law and more obedience to the law upon the part of those who might violate it. There could be no safer guardian for the Sherman antitrust law than the hundreds and thousands of people who are injured by these monopolies if the law were made easy of enforcement so far as they are concerned. In that respect, Mr. President, the Sherman antitrust law, in my judgment, might have been strengthened and possibly made a more effective statute than it is; but even with regards to those methods they have been rendered largely unnecessary by virtue of these decisions.

My objection, therefore, to this proposed legislation, to begin with the Trade Commission act and, secondly, with this bill, is that the principle upon which the Sherman antitrust law is built is being abandoned. No better illustration of that could be found than in section 2 of this particular act. Section 2 provides:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities—

And so forth.

Mr. President, the enforcement of that section is turned over to the discretion of a commission, which commission may tolerate, if it conforms to their attitude of mind, that which is clearly denounced and condemned by the Sherman antitrust law as a rigid, definite proposition; in other words, instead of defining and prescribing precisely what may be done and writing it into the statute so that every man in the United States may know precisely what he may do and the punishment which he will suffer if he violates the law—and that is what the Sherman antitrust law does—we have changed the policy and have attached to it a condition. Then, we have said that that entire matter is subject to the discretion and the judgment of a commission as to whether he can or can not do it. He will never know, Mr. President, until the commission decides it for him in his particular case, whether a certain act tends to lessen competition or to substantially lessen competition.

We should definitely and positively and beyond question deny the right to lower prices in a particular community when prices are kept up in another community, and we should attach a penal clause to that act punishing those who violate such a statute. That is one of the methods by which these monopolies have been built up; that is the method which practically all of them have pursued. It is reprehensible in law and reprehensible in morals, and it should not be left to the discretion of a commission, but should be definitely prohibited if we are going to deal with it at all. If we think it is necessary, in view of the decisions under the Sherman antitrust law, to deal with it, we should deal with it definitely, put it specifically into the statute, and attach to it a penal clause punishing those who violate it.

Section 3 of this proposed law reads:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price, on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

And the enforcement of that section is turned over to the Trade Commission. The enforcement of this entire act, Mr. President, with some exceptions to which I may call attention in a few moments, are so turned over; but the important features of it and the important provisions of it are turned over as to enforcement to either the Trade Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, or the Interstate Commerce Commission, whose powers go no further than to investigate and to issue an order against the doing of those things, provided that they conceive that the doing of them substantially lessens competition or they conceive the act to be within the purview of the statute; but all idea of punishment, of absolute prohibition, all idea of prohibiting things which we positively and unequivocally know build up monopoly and punishing them if they violate the law, are abandoned by virtue of this statute and by reason of the terms of the statute and the method of its enforcement. In other words, Mr. President, it is announced to the world as the judgment of the Congress that these matters should be tolerated, that they can be defended, and that they should be regulated through a commission. I think it is in direct contravention to the principle upon which the Sherman law is built, and will lead in the end to the most tremendous bureaucratic system of government here at Washington of which the human mind could conceive.

We are reaching into every field of activity and into every field of industry through our bureaucratic system and drawing to the city of Washington every individual and every citizen of the United States to find out from a board what he may do or what he may not do. The law should be written upon the statute books so that he may read it in his home, and when he reads it that he may know what he may do, and go into court and have his rights enforced and seek justice in his own bailiwick and within his own jurisdiction.

Mr. President, the wellsprings of democracy are individual freedom, individual initiative, self-reliance, and equal opportunity. From these sources come the resuscitating, rebuilding forces through and by means of which our obstacles to progress are overcome and the enemies of democracy are conquered. In the atmosphere of a free, open arena men grow to that full stature of citizenship which bears without weariness the weight and discharges with success all the obligations and duties of citizenship in a republic. You can not rear that class of citizens in a country of special privileges or in the character-destroying blight of bureaucracy. Self-reliance, self-help, the ambition to be one's own master and to look upon success in life as of one's own building are as indispensable to citizenship as God's own sunlight to the teeming forces of nature.

Privilege in any of its ten thousand subtle and insidious forms, monopoly regulated or unregulated, are at war with the first principles of a representative republic. Those people who are talking about regulating business are deceiving the people, for what they propose to do is not to regulate big business, which may be in no sense a monopoly, but to regulate monopoly, which is a different thing. Regulated monopoly is no different from unregulated monopoly, except that regulated monopoly has attached to it a horde of public officials for whom the people must pay, for in the end the monopoly would regulate the regulators and the only effect of regulation would be an additional amount of supernumeraries in the way of public officials. Regulated monopoly will separate the people into classes just as effectively, because there stands between the two classes in this instance the Government, which would in a sense be a barrier against the breaking down of classes. Regulation might help to ameliorate the amount of extortion, but classes would be established just the same and just as certainly. The very nature of monopoly is this, that some citizen has a privilege and an advantage which his fellow citizen has not. The very nature of monopoly is that some one is living off of another's toil.

Monopoly is founded in special favors and establishes its own distinction as to citizens. The old distinctions as to royalists and plebeians, of the governing and the governed, have more justification and were more easily defended than the distinctions founded in special favors or exclusive privileges. The thing to do is not to regulate such things but to destroy them. I do not care in what form privilege comes, it is not here for regulation but destruction. We had beneficent and kindly kings and monarchs, but we wanted none such. To hear men going about over the country arguing that because some grasping monopolies have not yet oppressed the people, or as much as they might have done, is to remind one of those miserable satellites of kingly power who lived upon the bounty of their monarchs and prostituted their minds and intellects by pleading for his continued power. You will find that many of those who are preaching for the regulation of monopoly are on the pay roll, directly or indirectly, of monopolies, or the beneficiaries of their political donations. To tell the people of this country that their food, their clothing, their warmth, their shelter, their wage must be trusted to the beneficent disposition of monopoly, or that those few men having this tremendous power will fear some political commission which they have created is to mislead and deceive and betray the people to their ruin and to plant the seeds of disintegration among their institutions and tabernacles of government.

To ask the people of this country at a time when they have won their fight in the courts against monopoly, at a time when there lies before them a code of laws and principles which puts the seal of condemnation and death upon special privilege and industrial monopoly in whatever conceivable form they appear, to now stand aside from the fight, let special privilege grow and monopoly thrive and trust to some commission to regulate these powerful institutions, a most false and vicious theory—institutions which have grown up in defiance of law—is to trifle with the happiness and future of every home in the land and to shamelessly leave the Republic to the mercy of those who despise the very name of democracy. Mr. President, I am not opposed to big units in business; on the other hand, I am thoroughly in favor of them where they are built up through giving services to the people, a better quality of goods; built up along honest and legitimate lines, no one can object to them, and no one will ever have any occasion to object to them. So long as business is conducted along honest and legitimate lines there will be no trouble about there being enough in the field to prevent monopoly. But I am opposed to all this meddlesome surveillance, this bureaucratic interference with the thousands of honest business men while we are preparing to let illegitimate business and monopoly practically have its own way. I am opposed to this scheme which has for its effect, if not for its purpose, to draw the fight away from monopoly and expend our energies and our time in overseeing those who need no overseeing and who need no surveillance. I know why it is done and everyone who reflects upon the situation knows why it is done.

So I am for open war on monopoly. Fifteen hundred years ago the Emperor Zeno issued the following edict: "We command that no one may presume to exercise a monopoly of any kinds of clothing or of fish or of any other thing serving for food or for any other use, whatever its nature may be, and if anyone shall presume to practice a monopoly let his property be forfeited and himself condemned to perpetual exile." The principle of that edict is as indispensable to the perpetuity of a republic as the principle of the emancipation proclamation of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the legislative situation existing in Washington is well illustrated, I think, by the attention which has been given to the masterly speech which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has just concluded. I do not believe there is a living man who can successfully controvert the statements which he has advanced relating to the results which are sure to come from this legislation which is now pending. Nobody knows what is going to happen. The best lawyers of this body and of the House of Representatives are in entire disagreement as to what the effect of this bill will be.

I have been listening to the debate on this subject off and on for several weeks, and I have come to the conclusion that there is not a Member of the Senate who really knows what the result of this legislation is going to be, either from a legal standpoint or from the standpoint of the great industrial operations of this country. Neither do those who framed the bill know what motives are behind this legislation.

It is contended that the people are demanding it. I do not know what people are demanding it. There is not anything in my correspondence which indicates that anyone is in favor of this legislation. I have examined with care the records of the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee and the Judiciary Committee of the House to find whether there was any definite desire on the part of any considerable number of people that legislation of this kind should be put on the statute books; and I have found, as the result of that investigation, that at least 25 witnesses have appeared against it where 1 has even given his assent to some form of it. The evidence which has been submitted to Congress on this subject is distinctly opposed, in my judgment, to any legislation of this kind, and the warning which the Senator from Idaho has delivered to the Senate with such force, and which has not, I regret to say, been listened to so that it will have any effect upon this legislation here, will be read and listened to by the country, for it is entirely justified. We have already adopted a bureaucratic system of government, which is sure to react against the best interests of business and every other operation in which our people are engaged.

I had sent to me this morning an editorial from the St. Louis Star, a paper referred to with approval yesterday in the debate by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], in which it approves of his course in opposing the conference report and calls on the President to veto the bill if it passes as the conference report provides. Why, bless the writer's innocent intellect, if he would confer with his representatives on the floor of the Senate, with the junior Senator from Missouri, or with his Washington representative, he would find that in the "bad old times" that formerly existed, when the House of Representatives and the Senate disagreed about legislation or the terms of legislation, they met and came to some kind of a compromise agreement, but under the "new freedom" which exists to-day there are three conferees—those representing the House, those representing the Senate, and the President himself; and, if common report can be given any credence in this matter, the President has had quite as much to do in bringing about the conference report which we are now considering as have the conferees of the two Houses themselves; and it is not likely that the editor of the St. Louis Star is going to attract any attention from the President of the United States looking to the veto of a proposition which he in a practical sense is himself dictating.

The result of that procedure is illustrated in the attendance on the deliberations of the Senate to-day, and the lack of attention to arguments for or against this legislation. The responsibility which should go with putting on the statute books such legislation as this should attract here every Senator, instead of only a small minority, during the discussion of this great question.

I am not criticizing the conferees in this matter, because we are creatures of custom and the slaves of practice; the custom and practice now is what I have outlined—not the deliberations of the representatives of the Senate and the House, but the deliberations of the representatives of these two bodies practically dictated to in detail by the administrative end of this Government. That condition in itself, in my judgment, will cause us serious trouble in time.

I am not going to discuss in detail the various phases of this bill. If I were to do so and were able to do so, I should do it along the lines followed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I believe it is bad legislation, and legislation that is going to cause serious trouble in this country. There might be some excuse for experimenting along these lines if business conditions were normal; but everybody knows that business conditions are abnormal, due to various causes, and especially to the great war which is being fought in Europe. It is no time to be imposing on business a new form of strait-jacket, the effect of which will have to be determined by long-continued litigation, as in the case of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I am one of those who believe that those engaged in large business, generally speaking, have been honestly trying to carry out the provisions of that law. They have employed the best legal talent, not to be told how to avoid the provisions of the law, but to be told what they can do and obey the law. Neither they nor their attorneys have known how far they could go; and it has only been as a result of long court procedure and the decisions of the court of last resort that there has been finally given to business men a fairly clear course which they may follow and keep within the provisions of the law.

When the Trade Commission bill was under discussion I referred to an opinion given by Senator Hoar to what was known as the Wire Pool very soon after the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Those people, engaged in manufacturing wire, asked Senator Hoar, who had had very much to do with if he was not a dominating factor in drawing that bill, if they could, within the provisions of the act, continue the methods of business which they were then following; the Senator gave a very long and comprehensive opinion on the subject. He was a great lawyer, and it may be assumed that he was as intimate with the terms and provisions of the act as any man in the Senate or any man in the United States at that time. The men who asked for the opinion followed with exactness the course which he outlined; and yet, within the last five years, every one of them has been fined from one to five thousand dollars for doing what Senator Hoar had told them they could do. That opinion is of so much importance, and may be of so much interest to Senators, that while I have not it at hand I ask unanimous consent that I may insert it in my remarks and have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The question is proposed whether an agreement with each other by several companies, the product of each of whom is manufactured in one State to be sold and delivered in another or in a foreign country, by which they stipulate that their product shall not be sold for less than an agreed scale of prices, and that each shall pay into the common stock, to be divided into an agreed proportion, all profits by it received beyond what comes from a specified amount of sales, is illegal, and exposes those who take part in it to the proceedings and penalties provided in the act of Congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies." Section 1 of said act is as follows:

"Every contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," etc.

It is clear that the second section of this statute has no bearing upon the question. One of the principal objects of the law is to prevent monopolies, which section 2 prohibits. But there is nothing in the above-described agreement which tends to create a monopoly. On the contrary, if enforced, it gives an advantage to corporations who do not enter into it and who can sell their product at a lower rate.

The only inquiry, then, is whether this contract is in restraint of trade within the meaning of section 1.

The object of the statute under consideration is to extend the common law to interstate and international commerce. The United States has no common law. Our national law consists of the Constitution and the statutes and treaties made in pursuance thereof. The several States, except those where the civil law prevailed at the time of their admission to the Union, adopted the English common law, either by the express provisions of their constitutions or statutes or by usage, so far as it is adapted to their circumstances and conditions. Among the common-law principles so adopted is that which renders certain contracts in restraint of trade unlawful. In some cases this rule is enforced by the penalties of the criminal law. In others contracts which do not subject those making them to any punishment are held illegal, as contrary to public policy, and the courts decline to enforce them.

Although the United States has no common law, yet where the phrase is used in national legislation to which the common law or the practice in the States has attached a special and definite meaning, the national legislation is presumed by the courts to use the phrase according to its common-law meaning or the meaning given to it by general usage in the States.

The Constitution gives to Congress the power of regulating commerce with foreign countries and among the States.

The sale of goods in one State to be delivered in another or in a foreign country is such commerce within the meaning of the Constitution.

The purpose of the statute above referred to, was to adopt the common-law principle as to contracts in restraint of trade as applicable to commerce with foreign nations or among the States, and to enforce that principle by suitable remedies and penalties.

We must look to the common law or to the usage of the States for the meaning of the words "restraint of trade" as used in the statute. It is not every contract which limits the freedom of the individual to engage in trade that the statute is intended to prohibit. Every person entering into a general copartnership is prohibited from trading on his own account in transactions within the scope of his copartnership business, and in that way his capacity to trade is restrained. But, of course, it could not be supposed for a moment that it was the purpose of Congress to prohibit the ordinary contract of partnership for the purposes of interstate or international commerce. So the sale of the good will of a business carries with it a restraint on the part of the grantor from engaging thereafter in the business in such a way as to affect the value of the good will he has sold. Yet no man would suppose that it was the purpose of Congress to prohibit a transaction so common and everywhere lawful by which a business gained by a lifetime of industry and skill may be made valuable to its possessor when he desires to retire from it.

It is needless to multiply examples. We must, therefore, take it to be unquestionable that it was the purpose of Congress in prohibiting contracts in restraint of trade to prohibit only such contracts in restraint of trade as were deemed unreasonable and contrary to public policy by the common law.

We understand that the common law prohibited contracts whose purpose was improperly and unreasonably to restrain trade in a manner which should affect the public interest by getting one party to a contract into the power of the other. But it did not prohibit such arrangements as were made upon good consideration and were necessary to the reasonable protection of health and legitimate business. There is some variety of opinion in the courts of different States as to the application of these simple principles. But it will be seen that in all the cases the courts have endeavored and undertaken to apply them to the best of their ability.

There are some cases in which the courts have treated contracts as illegal because they tended to defeat the object of special statutes. After the repeal of such statutes the decisions under them are no longer applicable, and are not to be considered as furnishing a rule in determining what contracts are to be considered as contracts in restraint of trade. For instance, there was an old English statute limiting wages in certain employments. Agreements entered into for the purpose of raising wages to a point above that fixed by these statutes were held illegal by the English courts. Those statutes have been repealed. Since their repeal it is presumed such contracts would be held innocent in the United States where no such statutes existed, and this whether with or without an express legislative sanction to that class of contracts. It has been held in accordance with the principles above laid down that a contract not to engage in a certain kind of trade or business in a particular locality is lawful. Such a contract is reasonable, as it enables the person entering into it to dispose of the good will of a business. But a contract not to engage in a particular trade or calling anywhere in the country or realm is unreasonable, in restraint of trade. Such a contract deprives the country of the skill of one of its citizens, while it is unnecessary for the protection of any other person in his trade or calling. Since the great change in the method of transacting business by the increased facilities of communication of modern times I suppose an agreement by one person not to manufacture in competition with another would be held valid, although the competitors' places of manufacture might be quite remote from each other. It was held in an early Massachusetts case that a contract by one person not to engage in the business to the northwest coast of North America was legal, and it was enforced by the court. At that time that trade was of very small extent, and one person could not well engage in it without competing with others so engaged. In the case above referred to, Perkins v. Lyman (9 Mass., 421), the court says: "The stipulation is for the benefit of the public, for it prevents the trade from being overdone, and so profitable to none."

Judge Sedgwick, Pierce v. Fuller (8 Mass., 222), states very well the doctrine of the common law in regard to restraint of trade. He says all contracts "barely in restraint of trade, where no consideration is shown, are bad. But cases of a limited restraint of trade, where it appears from the special circumstances that the contract is reasonable and useful, shall be good. And the consideration must always be shown that the contract may be supported by the special circumstances which induced the making of it. But these circumstances the court must judge, and if upon them it appears to be a just and honest contract, it will be maintained." Mr. Rand, in his note to the above case, says: "In order that a contract in restraint of trade may be valid, it must be partial, reasonable, and for an adequate consideration."

In Snow v. Wheeler (113 Mass., 197) Colt. J., says, "In the relations existing between labor and capital the attempt by cooperation on one side to increase wages by diminishing competition, or on the other to increase the profits due to capital, is within certain limits lawful and proper." It ceases to be so when unlawful coercion is employed to control the freedom of the individual in disposing of his labor or capital, and so it was held that an agreement not to teach new hands and thereby increase the number of persons to compete with the laborer was not unlawful.

In Carew v. Rutherford (106 Mass., 1, 14) it is said, "It is no harm for men to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work under a certain price." I can have no doubt that in Massachusetts an agreement of workmen not to work under a certain price, or not to work more than a certain number of hours per day, and an agreement among employers not to sell their goods under a certain price, or not to produce more than a certain quantity during any fixed season, supposing in both cases the agreement to have for its object the prevention of injury to the parties making it, by the lowering of the price of what they have to dispose of and so the destruction of their business on the same hand, or the loss of employment on the other, there being no attempt at a coercion of other people by criminal or unlawful means, would be held legal and valid. The cases depend upon the same principle. Such contracts are, I think, held reasonable by the community and will be sustained by the courts. They are not artifices or conspiracies entered into for the purpose of putting the community at the mercy of speculators or monopolists, but are only a reasonable method of self-defense against methods of competition which if unchecked are likely to end in the destruction of weak and feeble concerns or individuals and the establishment of monopolies by the rich and powerful.

In Mallan v. May (11 M. & W., 653) and Hitchcock v. Coker (6 Ad. & El., 438) it is affirmed that a covenant in restraint of trade is reasonable when it does not extend further than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the business of the obligee, and is unreasonable if it does extend further than is necessary for such protection.

In Hilton v. Eckersley (6 El. & Bl., 47) an agreement by 18 mill owners to be governed as to wages, discipline, and general management of their works by a majority of the parties to it, including the obligation to suspend or close the works altogether when the majority should so order, was held to be in restraint of trade and could not be enforced. That decision, however, was by a majority of the court, only Justice Erle dissenting. The facts of that case are exceedingly different from those supposed here. In that case the obligors put their own freedom of the conduct of their business absolutely into the control of each other. I suppose it would not be contended anywhere that an obligation to give up business altogether, not merely for a limited extent of territory, is not a contract in restraint of trade. And the contract in Hilton against Eckersley included that obligation if a majority of the parties should so require. Even on that case Justice Erle was of opinion that the agreement and its tendency was for the advancement of trade. For the workmen by combining not to work for one master while they are supported by wages from the others might ruin each separately, and unless the masters could protect themselves more effectually than by an indictment their trade might be destroyed.

There are two New York cases in which it was held that an agreement by all the owners of boats upon the Erie Canal to charge a certain price for freights and to keep a limited number of boats, and that if any boat owner had an application for more freight than he could accommodate with his existing number of boats he was to get the freight carried on the best terms possible and pay over the profit to the association, was illegal in restraint of trade. The reason chiefly insisted upon by the court was that these public carriers were using a canal provided by the State for the public accommodation at large cost, the canal route itself having many competitors, so that this arrangement was an injury to the State and contrary to the policy which had provided the canal for the public. Some phrases of the opinion imply that the court thought the contract void, as in the general restraint of trade. In King v. Journeymen Tailors of Cambridge (8 Mod., 10) an indictment was held good for conspiracy by the defendants to raise their wages. This was under a statute which fixed wages and made it criminal to conspire to raise them. Chief Justice Shaw, in Commonwealth v. Hunt (4 Met., 122), comments on this case and says that "all the laws of the parent country which were made for the purpose of regulating the rate of wages, not being adapted to the circumstances of our colonial condition, were not adopted, used, or approved here." In Young v. Timmins (1 Cr. & J., 331) it is said: "A contract in partial restraint of trade is good when upon an adequate consideration." Best, chief justice, in Homer v. Ashford (3 Bing., 324), says of reasonable contracts in restraint of trade, supported by adequate consideration: "The effect of such contracts is to encourage rather than cramp the employment of capital in trade and the promotion of industry." Park, chief justice, in Mitchell v. Reynolds (1 P. Wm., 191), says: "There may happen instances where these contracts may be useful and beneficial, as to prevent a town from being overstocked with any particular trade." Story on Equity, section 293, says: "It may even be beneficial to the country that a particular place should not be overstocked with artisans or other persons engaged in a particular trade or business, or a particular trade may be promoted by being for a short period limited to a few persons, especially if it be a foreign trade recently discovered, and it can be beneficial but to a small number of adventurers." There are some ancient forms of indictment at common law for conspiracy by workmen to raise their wages, but there can be no doubt that neither in any State in this country nor in England would such indictment be now sustained. Parsons on Contracts, volume 2, page 888, says: "The rule of the law upon this subject is somewhat peculiar. So long ago as in the times of the yearbooks the courts frowned with great severity upon every contract of this kind, but after a while the excessive aversion became much mitigated. Many exceptions and qualifications were allowed. If the series of cases on this subject are critically examined and considered in connection with the temporary alterations in the law or usage in other respects, we can not but think that reason may be found for believing that the law in relation to these contracts grew out of the English law of apprenticeship, to which we have already referred. By this law, in its original severity, no person could exercise any regular trade or handicrafts except after long apprenticeship and generally a formal admission to the proper guild or company. If he had a trade, he must continue in that trade or have none. To relinquish, therefore, was to throw himself out of employment, to fall as a burden upon the community, to become a pauper. But this ancient severity of the law is apprenticeship abated, and as this severity gradually relaxed it will be seen that contracts 'in restraint of trade' were treated with less and less disfavor until the present rule became established. In the application of this rule we shall see a gradual enlargement, until in this country at least it seemed to be a little more than nominal."

Upon the whole it seems to me very clear that the agreement by each of the persons in the contract above supposed furnished an adequate consideration for the agreement of all the others. Further, it seems to me that a contract, although in partial restraint of trade, which is reasonable and reasonably limited in point of time, which has for its object merely the saving the parties from a destructive competition with each other, is not prohibited by the statute above referred to. The question whether this contract is reasonable will be for the court. I think the contract above proposed is reasonable and would be so held by the courts of the United States. No manufacture can be established in this country without the prospect of reasonable permanence. To engage in the manufacture contemplated by these parties requires an expensive plant, large outlay for machinery, materials, and supplies, and the gathering together of sufficient number of artisans skilled in this particular manufacture. It is for the interest of the public that such enterprises shall be undertaken. They will not be undertaken without a prospect of reasonable permanence in prices, and they will not be undertaken by new and small establishments in competition with old and powerful ones if they are to be exposed to what is commonly called the cutthroat or "cutting under" process. The opinion of courts, like the opinion of the rest of the community, may vary in different generations as to what is reasonable. But the question of reasonableness will be a question of law for the courts, to be determined upon all the facts and in the light of the experiences, the business habits, and the public opinion of the present time.

This being my opinion, I think the parties to the agreement above supposed would not be likely to be convicted of an offense under the statute of last year.

I am further asked whether it is likely that a prosecution will be instituted against us. This is not a question of law. The gentlemen who are concerned in this business can judge as well as I can of the probability in this regard. It is probable that at some time proceedings will be instituted which will test this question as other similar questions that may arise under the statute. Whether this business would be likely to be selected as the object of proceedings for such a test would depend upon the feeling of their customers, and possibly their business rivals would be in favor of supporting and not of overthrowing this arrangement.

I can not see any distinction in principle between a contract of workingmen not to work for less than a stipulated sum as wages and a contract of employers not to sell their product for less than a stipulated sum. Both these being intended for their legitimate protection and not accompanied with any stipulation for unlawful, oppressive, or fraudulent methods, seem to me to be lawful within the policy of the law as it now exists and not to be in restraint of trade, but in advancement thereof.

My attention has been called also to the statute of the State of Missouri, approved April 2, 1891, entitled "An act providing for the punishment of pools, trusts, and conspiracies to control prices, and as to evidence and prosecution in such cases." This act can have no effect upon interstate commerce as above defined, namely, the manufacture of goods in one State to be sold and delivered in another. The jurisdiction of Congress over that subject is exclusive after Congress has acted, and no State law affecting it can have any constitutional validity. The law of Missouri is operative upon property within the State sold to be delivered there. The regulation of such sales is not within the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress. I am informed that there is a law like that of Missouri in Illinois, which I have not seen.

August 22, 1891.

Mr. WEEKS. After 20 years of trials of cases following the advice of attorneys and followed by the decisions of the courts, business has finally come to a reasonably sound conclusion, as far as the Sherman Antitrust Act is applicable. It will take as many years of doubt to determine what this law means, multiplied by the increased number of cases which will be covered by the provisions of this law as compared with those which are affected by the Sherman Antitrust Act. There are 300,000 corporations in the United States which would come under the jurisdiction of this commission; and anyone who has followed the course of the courts in the case of the Sherman Antitrust Act must be convinced that it will be many, many years before there will be even a reasonable course outlined by the courts themselves to indicate where business men may go, how far they may go, and where they must stop. All the time they will be employing expensive counsel to advise them what they may do, and the advice of counsel in many cases will be wrong, as it was in the case of Senator Hoar, to which I have referred.

There is one provision in this act to which I wish to refer particularly, and that is the one in section 8 relating to directorships in banks. We follow a directly contrary course in this country regarding directorships from that which has been evolved as a result of the experience of the rest of the world. In foreign countries with which we are in competition, where there are great industrial and business enterprises involved, it is the intent and the purpose of those who are interested in corporations or large business enterprises to obtain as directors those men whose previous experience and whose knowledge of the current conduct of business will make them safe and wise advisers. There are practically professional directors in those countries, and there is no limitation to the number of boards or the character of the boards on which such men may serve. Even the great national banks of Europe are directed by men who are almost without exception directors in other large corporations—directors in private banks, directors in joint-stock banks, directors in trust companies, directors in all the multitudinous operations in which the people of Germany and France and Great Britain are involved.

We are now providing that a man in a city having 200,000 people or more can not be a director of a national bank and a director of a State bank at the same time. There could not be a greater piece of folly, from the standpoint of sound business, than to put any such provision as that in this law. I regret that the Senate conferees did not stand by the bill as it passed the Senate; but, in any case, to limit directorships in a national bank to men who are not directors in a State bank under such conditions is going to be demoralizing and prejudicial to the best conduct of banking business in every one of the 28 cities which will come within the provisions of that paragraph.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator has noticed, I presume, that the provision to which he refers does not go into effect for two years?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but the provision is fundamentally wrong. It is not a question of when it goes into effect. It is a question of whether it is wise and sound, or unwise and unsound; and I contend that it is the latter.

State banks and trust companies in many respects conduct an entirely different kind of business from that conducted by national banks in such respects. They are supplementary to national banks. They do a trust business, a mortgage business, and various other things which are prohibited by the national banking act, so they are supplementary to national banks. But there is another and even sounder reason.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a proviso here allowing any bank to have one trust company at the same place, which can do the very thing the Senator is talking about.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but if the Senator will read the provision I think he will find that in that case the trust company must be entirely owned by the stockholders of the bank.

Mr. OVERMAN. Exactly; and it can do that kind of work. Another thing to which I wish to call the Senator's attention is that while a person can be a director in only one bank in one of these cities, outside of the city he can be a director in as many banks as he pleases. It applies only to banks located in the same city.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think I know the reason why this legislation has taken this form. There were cases, in one of the great cities of this country, especially, where certain men became directors in a considerable number of banks. I want to say frankly that I think it was carried too far, and that a provision which would prevent any such condition would be wise and salutary. If, however, the trust company or the State bank does perform the same general kind of banking which is conducted by the national bank, it is of manifest advantage to have a director of a State bank also eligible for a directorship in a national bank.

If there is any value in the examination of banks by examiners or inspectors—and I believe there is—that value is negatived by the fact that the same inspectors or examiners who examine the national bank never see the inside of the State bank. If, however, there is a man on the board of directors of the national bank who is at the same time a member of the board of directors of the State bank, so that he may give to the officers of the national bank the information which comes from his experience as a director of the State bank, then he is a more valuable director than any other that can be obtained.

You are taking that possibility away from hundreds of banks in the cities to which this legislation refers. It is injudicious and unwise, in my judgment, and I regret, as I said before, that the conferees of the Senate did not insist on leaving this provision out of the bill, although a provision which would have covered the instance which I have given would have met my approval.

Mr. President, what I particularly want to refer to in connection with this legislation is the bogy man which has been set up by almost all those who have discussed it, in the shape of the company known as the United Shoe Machinery Co. I know that in this saturnalia of crimination and recrimination and denunciation which goes on against large business combinations, large corporations called trusts, it is unusual for anybody to venture to say a word in defense of what he believes has been the building up of a great industry, which has been of benefit to all the people of this country and other countries. Yet I can not believe that in relation to this particular enterprise Senators or Representatives or the country at large has sufficient knowledge of its operations to warrant their indulging in the denunciation which has been indulged in, and in using it as a basis—as has been done in this case, in my judgment—for legislation.

It is true that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is now being proceeded against by the Government, which has asked for a dissolution of the company. That in itself should be sufficient reason, I think, why legislation should not be passed which is going to affect the operations of that company. The trial of the case has been completed; the evidence has been submitted; the arguments have been made. Incidentally, I want to say that all the evidence which has been retailed, in one form or another, before the Senate and House committees, and before the Senate itself, has been submitted to the United States courts in Boston. All of it has been passed on, and much of it has been thrown out of court, and it is now in the hands of three judges, who are writing the decision.

Under the circumstances I think Congress might well refrain from legislating in a way which is intended to affect directly that great industry until our courts have determined what course should be taken.

Not only that, but we have pending in the House legislation which very largely relates to this industry. It is a revision of the patent laws, which, in effect, is exactly what we are doing in this bill. A report has been made, and the bill is now on the House calendar dealing with this subject. I suppose, under the procedure we are now following, that some day this bill will be taken up in the Senate. When it is, it should be as thoroughly discussed as any legislation that ever has come before this body, because we have excelled in many of our industrial and business operations in this country because of our patent laws, as a result of our patent legislation; and before anything is done to destroy the effects of that legislation, the change should be given the utmost scrutiny.

I notice in the report which has been made on that bill, House bill 15989—a report which is astounding in its lack of accuracy—a paragraph which I want to read:

A monopoly of 98 or 99 per cent of the shoe-manufacturing machinery business of the United States brought about by acquirement of ownership of between seven and twelve thousand patents completely covering the shoe industry exists in the United States to-day. There is not a single shoe manufacturer in the United States able to continue in business against the pleasure of the owner of these patents, because of the power to enforce the tying and restrictive clauses based on patents and embodied in the lease contracts. This monopoly compels every shoe manufacturer in the United States using its machinery, and there are no others, to buy from it only at its arbitrarily fixed price all nails, wire, wax, and other necessities of the industry, under penalty of having his machinery ripped from his factory without notice or redress. Nobody can buy shoe-manufacturing machinery from this monopoly at any price, and because of the tying and restrictive clauses based on patents inserted in its lease contracts a monopoly of the manufacture of shoemaking machinery has been built up until to-day only 1 or 2 per cent of the shoe machinery in the United States is made by competing companies, and the machines made by these competing companies are only such machines as are not covered by patents and which can not be manufactured at a very great profit.

The Shoe Machinery Trust, by virtue of tying and restrictive clauses based on patents, under no circumstances permits its lessees to install shoe machinery obtained from a source other than itself, and as a result control of practically all of the shoe machinery in operation in the United States is retained in the patentee manufacturers. Machinery may be obtained from this monopoly by lease only. The company will not sell its machines, and its monopoly in its field is complete.

Mr. President, substantially every statement made in that report is untrue. Some of them are so far from the truth that it would seem as if the writer could not have given any investigation whatever to the facts. The entire record of the evidence of the trial of the Shoe Machinery Co., in Boston, which is now before the court, would substantiate the correctness of the statement which I have just made. But I want to refer particularly to some of the statements.

First. This record shows that even the United States abandoned the claim that the United Co. monopolizes shoe machinery generally, and claimed only that the company had a monopoly of "machines for preparing and attaching the bottoms to the uppers of boots and shoes, eyeletting machines, and clicking machines." In all other respects it abandoned the contention that there was a monopoly in shoe machinery.

I may well say at this point, Mr. President, that when the United Shoe Machinery Co. was formed it was a combination of three fundamental machines—the Goodyear Shoe Machinery Co., the McKay Shoe Machinery Co., and the McKay Lasting Machine Co.—all different in their purposes, one supplementary to the other, but not in any degree competitive. All those machines have to do with the sole of the shoe or the heel of the shoe and attaching the sole and the heel to the upper. The United Shoe Machinery Co. does not furnish the machinery which is used in making the uppers of shoes. Much of that machinery is made by the Singer Sewing Machine Co., which puts out many machines a day where the United Shoe Machinery Co. puts out one for use in the shoe-manufacturing business.

It takes more than 60 different machines to make a shoe. In some shoes as many as 185 operations are gone through, 28 of which are by hand, even in these days of machinery making. Some of that handwork has been obviated very recently by the United Shoe Machinery Co., which has spent a million dollars in developing what is called the pulling-over machine, which simply means pulling the leather over the last and tacking or fastening the leather to the sole of the shoe. It leases those machines to manufacturers on a royalty basis of three-eighths of a cent a pair.

Now, if it were necessary to buy such machines at a cost of $3,000 or $3,500, in addition to the great number of other machines which are necessary in making a shoe, it would be impossible for the smaller shoe manufacturers to purchase sufficient equipment to conduct their business. More than half of the 1,300 shoe manufacturers in the United States manufacture less than 700 pairs of shoes a day. They conduct a small business, but are able to undertake the business because they can lease machinery of the United Co.

Mr. OVERMAN. I feel curious on one point, to know what would be the cost, in making one pair of shoes, of the royalty paid for the use of these machines.

Mr. WEEKS. The highest possible machinery cost in making shoes is less than 6 cents a pair. The average is 2⅔ cents a pair. There are some grades of shoes where the cost is less than 1 cent a pair. On all the McKay shoes, not Goodyear shoes, manufactured in this country the machinery cost averages 1½ cents a pair. It is the only element entering into the manufacture of shoes which has not increased in cost since the organization of the United Shoe Machinery Co. in 1899.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from North Carolina asked the Senator what would be the royalty derived for making a pair of shoes by those who own the machines. Is that the way the Senator understood the question?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand that it is less than 6 cents a pair.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will yield to me a moment, does he mean by machinery cost the royalty cost?

Mr. WEEKS. The royalty cost.

Mr. LIPPITT. The price of the royalty?

Mr. WEEKS. The price of the royalty.

Mr. WEST. I thought the Senator said it was a cent and a half.

Mr. WEEKS. I said the highest possible cost is less than 6 cents a pair, and that in the McKay shoe the average machinery cost is 1½ cents a pair, and of all the shoes made by machinery in this country, 300,000,000 pair, the average machinery cost is 2⅔ cents a pair.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator how the other cost for a pair of shoes is made up. In material——

Mr. WEEKS. The other cost is made up in material, overhead cost, labor cost. The labor cost of making a pair of shoes is 22 per cent of the total cost.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But the machine takes the place of the former individual labor.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no; the Senator has not investigated the subject. The actual labor cost of making shoes is 22 per cent to-day. It is 22 per cent of the cost of the shoe, in addition to which the machinery cost may be from two-thirds of a cent a pair to 6 cents a pair.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Even admitting that fact, it would seem that we are paying to somebody an inordinate price for shoes.

Mr. WEEKS. The average profit made by shoe manufacturers in the United States on all shoes sold is less than 7 cents a pair. Take shoes like those the Senator is probably wearing now. I presume that he paid $5, the retail price.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator is about right.

Mr. WEEKS. The cost of those shoes was about $3 a pair to the manufacturer—probably $2.75, but call it $3 a pair. Of that cost 66 cents, or 22 per cent, went to labor; and of that cost not over 4½, probably not over 4, cents a pair was machinery cost.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know this fact. I have come in contact with a good many of the unfortunate and lowly in my walks in life, and I have come in contact with many of those who are making shoes and who have a pegging machine, a lasting machine, or whatever else. I have talked with a number of them, and they all of them rebel that they can not own their machines. I can not recall an instance where they have not rebelled at the thought that they had to hire the machines. I recall a German who said in his broken tongue that he felt when he had really to pay his money that he should have the right to own his machine and not be restricted to buy his thread, his wax, his pegs, and God knows what—all that went into a shoe—from the company that leased these machines. I heard his tale.

Then I have heard the tale of a very distinguished and delightful gentleman whose name is Barbour, of the Barbour flax thread that enters into shoes. I happen to know Mr. Barbour, who is a multimillionaire, a fine type of a fellow, who had an ambition to run for Congress once in New Jersey. He lives in Paterson. But he was annihilated in the contest for votes. It was Mr. Barbour's idea that it was a great blessing for the shoe man that he could not buy his machines, that he had to lease them; and, by the way, he is largely in the Shoe Machinery Co.

Now, there were two sides; one was the poor devil who was using the machine, the other was the millionaire who was getting a profit out of it. They viewed it through different lenses. It does seem to me that there ought to be some way to get together. I do not know that it is unfortunate to be a shoemaker, but they work hard and long and get but little compensation. It does seem to me that there should be some way whereby the man who owns these privileges and patent rights should be reasonably satisfied and that the fellow who sits bending over his last at the tiresome task of making shoes the day long should have the right to own that which he was quite willing to pay for. I think it is an awful evil.

I happen to know this gentleman, Mr. Barbour, that I speak of. He is a multimillionaire, as I said, a fine, genial gentleman, a very good, loyal friend; and I know other poor men with whom I come in contact, and I very often ask myself, in God's name, is there not some way by which these two ends may be reasonably and yet fairly satisfied?

Mr. WEEKS. Has the Senator finished?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know anyone who could make a more tearful plea for the manufacturer than the Senator has just made, but if he will take the trouble to examine the record of the hearings before the Judiciary Committee of the House or the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, he will not find a single word from a manufacturer of shoes who manufactures less than 10,000 pair a day protesting against this process which he is now criticizing, and I will say to the Senator, if this legislation takes effect, instead of having 1,300 shoe manufacturers in the United States, some of them—the little fellows he is speaking of—will be eliminated, so that we will have a monopoly in the shoe-manufacturing business, something that would be a thousand times worse than that complained of in the case of machinery. Attempts are being made now—and I intend to show, before I get through, the animus of this attack on the United Shoe Machinery Co.—for attempts are being made by those who manufacture on a large scale to break down this system so that they may get their machines on different terms from those made to the smaller men, so that they may control the manufacture of shoes in this country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THORNTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WEEKS. I always yield to the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not speak with any desire to be bitter or to be unjust or unfair toward these men.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand the Senator.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. As I said, the gentleman whose name I mentioned I know very well. He is a most companionable and delightful citizen. But I speak from the humanitarian side. My sympathies are very quickly and very easily reached. Perhaps some of my fellows here have discovered it. My heart has ached under the present situation. It has seemed to me that with the wonders of our progress and our intelligence and our ingenuity we should devise a plan somehow soon, whereby both these men might meet on fair ground, with ample and reasonable compensation and justice to both.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator's heart will not ache for the particular individuals to whom he is referring if this legislation goes into effect, because they will be out of business. They could not continue business if they had to buy the more than 60 machines that are used in manufacturing shoes. Some of those machines cost a thousand dollars apiece. I referred to the pulling-over machine which would have to be sold at $3,500 apiece. The very fact that these machines are leased on a fair basis, I think, enables the smallest man to start a shoe-manufacturing business, and that is the reason why the industry is so thoroughly distributed in the United States to-day. As I have said, more than half the manufacturers manufacture less than 700 pairs a day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. Very gladly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] contends that the teeth have been extracted from this measure. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say if it goes into effect there will be a monopoly of shoe machinery.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to frankly say that I do not expect to influence anyone by what I am saying. The United Machinery Co. is a Massachusetts corporation. It employs something like 3,000 to 4,000 men. It pays them the highest average pay paid to any similar number of employees in any industry in the United States or in the world. I am interested that such an enterprise shall be fairly represented on the floor of the Senate, and it is for that reason that I am trying to explain to the Senate and trying to put in the RECORD what the United Shoe Machinery Co. is, what it has done or is doing, and I am trying to point out that it is not the reprehensible corporation which it has been held to be in the discussions which have taken place.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WEEKS. Gladly.

Mr. WEST. Before the Senator from Massachusetts drifts away from that part of the subject in reference to the making of shoes, he said a few minutes ago that it took 66 cents to pay for the labor and there was a payment of 4 cents on the machinery.

Mr. WEEKS. I said for such a shoe as would retail at $5.

Mr. WEST. I wear a pair of shoes bought in this city for which I paid $6. I am curious to know where the balance of that $6 goes; 70 cents goes to the machinery and the labor; where the balance of it goes is what I am curious to know. Of course there is some part of the cost in the material.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator yield to me? Before answering that question perhaps the Senator will state what the wholesale price is of the shoe that retails at $6.

Mr. WEEKS. I will. Of course I am not attempting to give accurate figures, because they will vary with varying cases; but the labor cost is about, as I said, 22 per cent of the cost. The other costs to the manufacturer are the cost of his material, the overhead charges, and all the expenses that go to make up the cost in any manufacturing establishment; but in the case of a shoe that would sell at four dollars and a half, we will say, the cost of manufacture would be about two dollars and a half.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WEEKS. Just let me finish this sentence, please. It would be about two dollars and a half, possibly two dollars and seventy-five cents. The wholesaler would make, perhaps, 5 cents a pair, certainly not over 10 cents, and probably, ordinarily, not over 5 cents. It costs about 33 per cent of the selling price of shoes to retail them. Therefore, if you take a shoe selling at $4.50, 33 per cent of that would be $1.50, which would be the cost of retailing. The retailer may make 10, 15, or 20 cents a pair profit; the wholesaler may make 5 cents a pair on shoes costing the manufacturer $2.70 a pair. The average profit which the manufacturer makes on all the shoes made in the United States, as I said before, is about 7 cents a pair. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The royalty collected by this shoe machinery company may run as high as 6 cents a pair.

Mr. WEEKS. It may run as high as 6 cents a pair.

Mr. REED. So the royalty collected by this one company may be almost equivalent to the profits of the manufacturer who has taken all the chances of the business and who has done all the work of producing the shoe.

Mr. WEEKS. That may be the case, but the Senator——

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think——

Mr. WEEKS. Just a moment. The Senator will recall that in the McKay shoe the average royalty is 1½ cents a pair, and there are more McKay shoes made than all the others put together, and that the average royalty paid for all shoes is only 2⅜ cents a pair.

Mr. REED. The Senator spoke about the organization of these three companies into one company, which is now the United Shoe Machinery Co. Does the Senator know the name of the attorney who worked out the legal problems of that consolidation?

Mr. WEEKS. I presume that there was more than one attorney engaged in doing it. One of the attorneys, who was for a long time a director of the company and who, I have understood, drew the leases which have been in operation ever since, was Mr. Brandeis.

Mr. REED. That is Mr. Louis D. Brandeis?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. REED. The reformer. I understand the Senator to say that he understood Mr. Brandeis had also drawn the leases which this company has been using?

Mr. WEEKS. I have been informed that Mr. Brandeis drew the original leases which the shoe machinery company used and which they are using to-day substantially as they were originally drawn.

Mr. REED. The Senator spoke this morning of the allegations upon which the Government is now standing in the suit against the Shoe Machinery Trust, and therefore I conclude he must be familiar with that litigation. I want to ask him if it is not a fact that one of the main allegations in the Government's suit is that these contracts which the Senator says were drawn by Mr. Brandeis are violative of the Sherman Act?

Mr. WEEKS. The Government's contention has been modified very materially since it was originally made, but the Government is contending that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is a monopoly, and has brought suit to dissolve the monopoly.

Mr. REED. I want to call attention, if I am not interrupting the Senator against his will——

Mr. WEEKS. Not at all; I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the seventh section of one of those contracts made the 3d day of August, 1910, between the United Shoe Machinery Co. and the Commonwealth Shoe & Leather Co. Section 7 reads as follows:

7. If at any time the lessee shall fail or cease to use exclusively welt sewing and outsole stitching machinery held by him under lease from the lessor, in the manufacture of all "welted" boots, shoes, or other footwear made by or for him, the welts or soles of which are sewed by the aid of machinery, or shall fail or cease to use exclusively turn sewing machinery held by him under lease from the lessor in the manufacture of all "turn" boots, shoes, or other footwear, the soles of which are sewed by the aid of machinery, the lessor, although it may have waived or ignored prior instances of such failure or cessation, may at its option terminate forthwith by notice in writing this lease and license and any other lease or license of "Goodyear department" machinery then existing between the lessor and the lessee, whether as the result of assignment to the lessor or otherwise; and the possession of and full right to and control of all the leased machinery and all "Goodyear department" machinery held by the lessee under lease or license from the lessor or its assignor shall thereupon revest in the lessor free from all claims and demands whatsoever.

I understand that to be what is commonly known as the tying clause of these contracts. I understand that that tying clause is the work of the legal ingenuity of Mr. Brandeis. If I am able to interpret it, it vests in this company the power to take out of any factory machinery obtained from it which it has heretofore used or which it is now using; that no matter how long the lease may run under its terms, no matter what the conditions of the sale may have been, there is vested in this shoe machinery company the right to enter the premises where the machinery is installed and take it out if the lessor ventures to use any one of these machines that are named which was not obtained from this company. I want to ask the Senator if those facts do not constitute one of the main grounds of the attack by the Government to-day in its suit?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr President, that is one of the grounds.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if that system were to be extended and generally employed by those who may possess some patented article of great value if it is not possible under it for the owner of a patented article to practically establish a monopoly not only over the patented article, but over a great number of machines which he may manufacture.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, as a definite statement I think the Senator is correct, but there are modifications which would apply to the United Shoe Machinery Co. which I will, when I have an opportunity, indicate to the Senate.

Mr. REED. The Senator has stated that Mr. Brandeis drew this contract. I want to ask the Senator if this particular form of contract was not attacked in the Legislature of Massachusetts and some legislation attempted to make it impossible to make this kind of a contract?

Mr. WEEKS. It was, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know who at that time was representing the Shoe Machinery Co. in resisting that legislation?

Mr. WEEKS. The information I have on that subject is contained in a letter which I have before me, which was included in the hearings before the Committee on Patents of the House of Representatives. A letter written by Mr. Coolidge, treasurer of the United Shoe Machinery Co., to Hon. CALVIN D. PAIGE, who represents the fourth district of Massachusetts, who was a member of that committee, in which he says, speaking of Mr. Brandeis:

Mr. Brandeis helped to organize the United Shoe Machinery Co. Prior to 1899 he was a director of the McKay Shoe Machinery Co., one of the three noncompeting concerns from which our company was formed. He was one of the first directors of the United Shoe Machinery Co. and one of its legal advisers, and as a lawyer he helped to draft the leases which he now denounces. Assuming that he felt then as he says he feels now—that the director of a company occupies a fiduciary relation to its stockholders—he must have believed himself responsible for the character of our leases, even if he had not helped to draw them; yet throughout his association with our company he never criticized them, and in 1906 he appeared before the Massachusetts Legislature to defend the very methods which he now attacks.

And later in that letter Mr. Coolidge says, speaking of an opinion by him to Charles H. Jones, his client. In this published opinion he assured Mr. Jones—this is the quotation:

The leases being invalid, you can not be liable for failure to perform.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask, after the Massachusetts Legislature passed the bill which restricted the right to make leases of this character, whether the Senator knows who it was who devised the plan to escape the effect of that law, the plan being to simply add a clause giving a right to terminate the lease—the clause, indeed, that I read a moment ago, and under which the proprietor of the machinery or lessor of the machinery can go into a man's factory the moment he puts in a machine that he did not make and take out all the machines there are there and close down his business and ruin him? I wish to ask if the Senator knows whether Mr. Brandeis devised that means of meeting the statute of Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. No, Mr. President; I have not any information on that subject.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator, if I am not too much trespassing upon his time, if he knows who it was who first introduced into the House of Representatives a bill containing what is now substantially section 5 of the Trade Commission bill, section 5 being the provision that "all unfair competition is hereby declared to be unlawful"?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not recall who introduced it.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator that that bill was introduced by Representative STEVENS of New Hampshire. Representative STEVENS of New Hampshire also introduced at about the same time House bill 13305, entitled "A bill to prevent discrimination in prices and to provide for publicity of prices to dealers and to the public," a clause of which reads as follows:

That in any contract for the sale of articles of commerce to any dealer, wholesale or retail, by any producer, grower, manufacturer, or owner thereof, under trade-mark or special brand, hereinafter referred to as the "vendor," it shall be lawful for such vendor, whenever the contract constitutes a transaction of commerce among the several States * * * to prescribe the sole uniform price at which each article covered by such contract may be resold.

Then follow some qualifying provisions.

I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not know that that bill was introduced at the request of the American Fair Trade League, and that Mr. Ingersoll, the president of the Ingersoll Watch Co., is the president of the American Fair Trade League; and if he does not also know that Mr. Brandeis is his attorney?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not any information on that subject.

Mr. REED. Well, evidently I have gotten into a field that the Senator from Massachusetts has not been over.

Mr. WEEKS. I have no information at all on the subject.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated that Mr. Brandeis did draw the contracts of the Shoe Machinery Trust. Does the Senator know at what time Mr. Brandeis severed his connection with that concern as attorney or officer?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, in that particular I have quoted what is a part of the public record in relation to Mr. Brandeis's association with the organization. As an attorney for the United Shoe Co. in 1906 he did appear for the company before the legislature. Since that time he has been employed by others than the Shoe Machinery Co., and he has publicly attacked the laws which he is supposed to have had a very potent hand in drawing.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know whether Mr. Brandeis had anything to do with instigating the litigation that is now pending and furnishing information?

Mr. WEEKS. I have no definite details, Mr. President, but Mr. Brandeis has represented those who have been very active in attacking the Shoe Machinery Co., particularly Mr. Charles H. Jones, of the Commonwealth Shoe Co. of Massachusetts.

Some time ago, Mr. President, I was referring to a report which had been made by the Committee on Patents relating to this subject, and I indicated that, in my judgment, there was no statement in that report which was accurate; that some of the statements were very far from having any basis; and that the records of the United States court in Boston would bear out the truth of my contention. Now I am going on to read some of the replies to the statements made in the report from which I have read:

The record shows—

That is, the record of the United States court—without contradiction, that of the 1,300 to 1,500 shoe manufacturers of the United States, the United Co. leases machines to not more than 1,033, and to many of these it leases only one or two machines of the hundreds which they use.

Incidentally, and perhaps properly to be referred to at this time, one of those who have attacked the United Shoe Machinery Co. for years is Mr. Richard H. Long, of Framingham, Mass., a shoe-machinery manufacturer and a shoe manufacturer. Mr. Long manufactures what is known as the Waldorf shoe, a shoe well known in the trade, which he sells through his own stores. Mr. Long has not to-day, and he has not had for years, a single machine in his factory put out by the United Shoe Machinery Co.; all of his machines are machines of his own manufacture or of the manufacture of some other than the United Shoe Machinery Co.

The reason why manufacturers use the machinery of the United Shoe Machinery Co. is because it is the best machinery; it is a test of efficiency, pure and simple; it is not a question of a lease or of a tying clause or of a sale or of anything of that kind.

The United Shoe Machinery Co. puts out something like 300 different machines. Most of those machines may be purchased or leased, at the option of the user. It is only the three fundamental machines relating to those parts of the shoe to which I have previously referred which are leased, and only leased.

I want to say now, for fear that I may overlook it, that not only are these machines leased to every manufacturer in the United States, large and small, East and West, North and South, on exactly the same terms, but they are leased to every manufacturer in Europe who uses the machines on exactly the same terms. The United Shoe Machinery Co. manufactures machines in England, in France, and in Germany, and it leases to the foreign manufacturer those machines which are manufactured where the labor cost is hardly more than one-third of what is the labor cost in the United States on exactly the same terms the lease is made in this country.

I think I ought to say here that one reason why we dominate—and it is the main reason—the shoe-manufacturing business not only of this country, but of the world, is because of the perfection of the machinery which has been developed by this company. I have any amount of testimony here from manufacturers—and Senators can find it in the reports to which I have referred—relative to the excellence of this machinery. We not only provide ourselves with shoes in this country, but we are exporting shoes—a very unusual thing for us to do under the tariff conditions which obtain—because we make them in this country to fit the foot. We have developed the last and machinery to such perfection that we are able to furnish any shaped foot with a shoe. Senators will recall that 20 years ago when they bought a ready-made shoe they almost invariably had to break it in at considerable pain and trouble. Now you can go into any 1 of 20 shoe stores down here on Pennsylvania Avenue and the salesman will fit your foot with a shoe, so that you walk off with as much comfort as if you had worn it for a month. That is due not only to the perfection of the lasts, which we have developed in this country, but to the perfection of the machinery in making the shoe, and very largely to the Goodyear welt, which is the best form of shoe we have developed and of which there are made in this country probably twenty times as many as there were when the United Shoe Machinery Co. was formed 15 years ago.

Now, to proceed with the answers to the statement in this report of the House Committee on Patents:

Second. The record shows without contradiction that of the 1,300 to 1,500 shoe manufacturers of the United States the United Co. leases machines to not more than 1,033, and to many of these it leases only one or two machines of the hundreds which they use.

Third. The record shows that the United Co. offers to all manufacturers leases of its leased machines without any tying clauses whatever. The tying clauses are used at the option of the shoe manufacturer in connection with wholesale and cheaper methods of obtaining the use of the company's machines. Where he takes the leases with the tying clauses in them, he does so because he prefers those leases.

Fourth. The company requires manufacturers to buy nails or wire or eyelets of it only when they lease machines, the entire payment for the use of which is comprised in the price charged for the nails or wire or eyelets. The company does not require wax or any other necessities of the industry to be bought of it, either "under penalty of having machinery ripped from the factory without notice" or any other penalty.

There is a reason for buying nails and wire of a standard quality. A machine works well when the material with which it has to work is of the highest standard, but it may work badly if the material furnished for that purpose is of low standard. Knowing the standard of this product, in order to assure that the machines of this company will work satisfactorily, as they should work and do work, it has been considered advisable and desirable that the manufacturers using the machines should buy the nails and wire of this company at the price at which they would be purchased in the open market.

Fifth. The record shows that the company sells outright to all customers at uniform prices 170 different types of machines, or considerably more than half of the various kinds it manufactures.

Sixth. The record abounds in testimony from shoe manufacturers that the company has never interfered with their obtaining machines of other manufacturers and using them side by side with machines obtained from the United Co.

I want Senators to remember that I am reading from the record of the trial of this case in the United States court in Boston. I read further:

All the machines for stitching the uppers of shoes in every factory in the United States are obtained from manufacturers other than the United Co. Even the United States made no claim that the United Co. had a monopoly of machines for stitching the uppers of shoes.

It is unnecessary in detail to further refute the assertions made. The record in the case mentioned is a complete answer to them. The files of the Commerce Department of the United States show by the reports of its consular and other agents that the United States leads the world in the variety and excellence of its shoe machinery, and this result has been accomplished by the efforts of the United Co.

There probably has not been a year since the organization of that company that at least $500,000 has not been spent in developing machinery; and when the United Shoe Machinery Co. develops a new machine or an improvement on an old machine, it takes out the old machine and puts in the new one without any cost to the manufacturer, so that the manufacturer has the benefit of up-to-date machinery all the time. If Senators could go back to conditions which existed before 1899, before the organization of this company, and understand under what restrictions the shoe business was carried on on account of machinery then used, they would the better appreciate and value what this company has been to the industry. For instance, every manufacturer of shoes wishes to have as modern and up-to-date machinery as can be obtained. He would buy a machine which seemed to be all right which was so represented, but it had not been thoroughly tested, and as a result it would buck. It was necessary for the manufacturer to keep at hand a skilled mechanic all the time to make the necessary renewals and repairs. Under these conditions frequently such machines had to be taken out after they had done an amount of poor work, which would affect adversely the business of the manufacturer in addition to the actual loss involved.

The machines of the United Shoe Machinery Co. are thoroughly tried out before they are put in, and the Shoe Machinery Co. employs men, available at all times, to keep the machines in order, without any cost to the manufacturer except the cost of spare parts where new parts are needed. That policy is not only a benefit to the manufacturer, but it is of special benefit to the shoe workmen.

I have myself talked time and again with the employees of shoe factories in Massachusetts about the results obtained from this manner of conducting the business, and I never have seen a man who has not stated to me, "We get better results under the conditions to-day than we did in the old days when the machines were breaking down." "Why?" "Because frequently a machine would break down under those old conditions and the manufacturer would have to send for an expert to repair the machine and we would be laid off for half a day, sometimes for a day, before the machine would be ready to go on with its work. Now in 15 or 20 minutes, in any large shoe-manufacturing center, an expert can be obtained who makes the machine workable, so that the workmen can complete a day's work each day within reasonable hours."

Now, let me point out to you how it is a benefit to the small manufacturer. The extract which I will read is only one of hundreds of such from small manufacturers relating to this industry. It is written by Mr. R. O. Green, of Fort Dodge, Iowa, in which he refers to the advantages in very definite terms and denies the truth of many statements that have been made concerning the Shoe Machinery Co. Mr. Green says:

Now, as to any presumed extortion from the consuming public. What would be the result if we were operating under old conditions? Several different machines for doing the same operations would be on the market, some good, some bad, and some quite indifferent, but none of them with the efficiency of the machines in operation now, because the United Shoe Machinery Co. do not put out machines until they have been thoroughly tested and found absolutely perfect in their operation.

This is necessary from every point of economy, because their revenue depends upon the perfect and constant working of the machines, as most of the royalty is paid so much per pair. The shoe manufacturer is not a machinist. When, under old conditions, he bought a machine he had to buy it outright and take his chances on its doing the work as represented by the company selling, and also take his chances on an improvement being made at any time which would make his machinery worthless. He would have to employ an expert machinist, competent to take care of all his machines, which could hardly be done, for the United Shoe Machinery Co. people find they have to and do employ separate machinists for each system of machines. If such a machinist could be employed, he would be a very high-priced man, and the ordinary manufacturer could not afford to pay the price, and if they did they would have to add the extra cost to the cost of the shoe. So, taking the expense incurred by depreciating machinery, which would be constantly occurring in large degree, other than ordinary wear and tear on account of continual supposed improvement, together with the large expense of employing at high salaries expert machinists to take care of and keep in repair the machines, the cost per pair over what it now costs would conservatively amount to four or five times as much as the present royalty system involves. What would be the result? Every small concern, and, in fact, every concern except the very largest, would be forced out of business, because they would not have capital enough to keep up their machinery account and employ the high-priced experts to take care of it, and we would have a shoe manufacturers' trust far more formidable and costly to the consumers than under present conditions. The fact is that under the admirable organization of the United Shoe Machinery Co. the industry of shoe manufacturing is stimulated, so that any energetic, capable person with a little money can go into the shoe-manufacturing business.

I will not quote further, but there is much more to the same general purport in the letter.

I have here a statement made by Hon. James M. Curley, the present Democratic mayor of Boston. I presume Mr. Curley, before he had investigated, might have had in his own mind some doubt about the value of the policy which was being carried on by this company, but it seems that last summer he made an investigation, and I quote from a statement which he made which was published in the Boston papers. Mr. Curley said:

I sincerely wish that it were possible that every public man, especially our State and National officials, visit this industrial institution that they might grasp at first hand the grand work that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is striving to do, that the benefits it affords its home community, the State, and eventually the Nation might be comprehended. The policy of the State and National Governments would no longer persevere in the channels recently chosen, secondhand information would no longer be accepted in substitution for facts, bitter and unfounded attacks would be constituted a crime. The Government instead would throw about beneficent companies of this character a protecting arm, warding it from abuse, suits, and legal entanglements which it now places in its path, that its energies be allowed to develop and be conserved for larger and more highly efficient industry.

Look about you. New England cities and towns are dotted with shoe factories owned by whom? By the young men of New England, small manufacturers who have prospered and developed under the liberal policy of the United Shoe Machinery Co., and to-day many of them are beyond the state of immediate financial worry. Young men, and in New England there are hundreds of them, who have nothing to offer this company as security but brains, energy, perseverance, and an expert talent for making good shoes, have by the policy pursued by this company become successful manufacturers, grown and fostered by the United Shoe Machinery Co.

There is more of it, but that is an indication of what the mayor of Boston said after he had made an examination of the premises and the manner of conducting the company's business.

Mr. President, what is the incentive for this legislation? Who has been creating the public sentiment which has apparently brought this company into such disfavor with legislators and in other ways? Why, it is none other than those who want to break down the policy which this company has been following in order that they may profit thereby. It is not the small manufacturer, for he has profited by their policy; but it is the large company that wants to break down that policy so that it may buy its machines on better terms than the small company can do, at wholesale prices, so to speak, for it knows that the little fellow can not raise the capital to buy the machines, and as a result the business would become concentrated. There is no doubt this would be the result if this bill becomes a law and the United Co. is compelled to change its method of doing business.

My friend the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] put into the RECORD yesterday a telegram from the International Shoe Co., of that State, and also a telegram from John C. Roberts, commending him for what he was doing in connection with this legislation, and showing a particular leaning against the United Shoe Machinery Co. As those telegrams are in the RECORD, I will not read them now; but I want to say, before I overlook it, that Mr. John C. Roberts, who was referred to as the editor or the owner or the manager of the St. Louis Star, is one of the firm of Roberts, Rand & Johnson, shoe manufacturers of St. Louis, which is now a part of the International Shoe Co.; and, therefore, when a telegram is printed here from the International Shoe Co., it may be presumed that it is from Mr. Roberts as well, so no additional weight can be given to the telegram, which has been printed in the RECORD from Mr. Roberts.

What is the International Shoe Co.? This company has an authorized capital of $25,000,000 and an issued capital of $21,000,000. They have the largest capacity of any shoe manufacturing concern in the world—over 50,000 pairs of shoes a day. There are very few concerns in the United States which have a capacity of 10,000 pairs a day. Of the 1,300 shoe-manufacturing concerns in the United States, the United Shoe Machinery Co., as I have stated, leases machines to about 1,000, and to many of these it leases only one or two machines of the hundreds which are used. Of the 1,000 shoe-manufacturing concerns in the United States which get machines from the United Co., 750 make less than 500 pairs a day. In other words, the International Shoe Co. has a capacity which is more than the equivalent of 100 of these smaller concerns, and these smaller concerns, almost without exception, are partnerships or individually owned. There are very few corporations engaged in the shoe-manufacturing business which have a capacity of 5,000 pairs a day.

The International Shoe Co. comes nearer than any other concern in the world to being a shoe trust, and it is constantly reaching out for more. The only thing that stands in its way is the United Shoe Machinery Co., and that, in my judgment, accounts for its animus against that company. Its methods of doing business, enabling the small manufacturer to get this machinery on the same terms as the larger company, prevents the International Co. from extending its operations indefinitely, as it otherwise would do.

The value of the different concerns which went to make up the consolidation now called the International Shoe Co. at the time the consolidation was made was about eight and a half million dollars, or one-third of the authorized capitalization of the combination.

I am simply giving this information because I want Senators to have clearly in their minds some of the animus behind this attack on the shoe machinery company.

The International Shoe Co. is, in the amount of its authorized capital, two-thirds as large as the United Shoe Machinery Co., which is being attacked. It was formed by the combination of many concerns, most of which were originally in competition with one another, selling their shoes in the South and Southwest. The combination now includes 11 formerly independent concerns and controls 21 factories in Missouri and Illinois. The nucleus of the combination was the firm of Roberts, Johnson & Rand, of St. Louis, which had developed a large business from a small beginning while using the United Shoe Machinery Co.'s machines on the very terms which they now denounce as oppressive and tyrannical.

They never had made shoes at all until after the organization of the United Co. The Roberts, Johnson & Rand Shoe Co.'s first attempt at monopolizing the southwestern shoe business was early in 1911, when they tried to effect a combination of the four largest shoe-manufacturing concerns in St. Louis, known at that time as the "big four"—the Roberts, Johnson & Rand Shoe Co., the Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co., the Brown Shoe Co., and the Peters Shoe Co. These concerns at that time did a business of about $80,000,000 a year. Prior to that time the Roberts, Johnson & Rand Shoe Co. had taken over the plants of three independent companies—the Jerseyville Shoe Co., of Jerseyville, Ill.; the Star Shoe Co., of Hannibal, Mo.; and the Desnoyers Shoe Co., of Springfield, Ill. Hamilton-Brown and the Brown Shoe Co. preferred to remain independent; but in December, 1911, the International Shoe Co. was organized, taking over the business of the Roberts, Johnson & Rand Shoe Co. and the Peters Shoe Co. This gave them the control of 16 factories, 2 of which were in the State of Illinois and 14 in the State of Missouri. Ten of these had been managed by the Roberts, Johnson & Rand Shoe Co. and 6 by the Peters Shoe Co.

December 10, 1912, the International Co. took over the business of the Friedman-Shelby Shoe Co., who were then operating five shoe factories in Missouri. The Friedman-Shelby Co. was itself a combination, having taken over three independent plants—the Morris Bros. Shoe Co., of Mexico, Mo., in October, 1907; the Giesecke Boot & Shoe Manufacturing Co., of Jefferson City, Mo., in January, 1910; and the Giesecke-D'Oench-Hays Shoe Co., of St. Louis, in January, 1910.

On August 1, 1913, the International Co. took over the business of the Sterling Shoe Co., in Belleville, Ill.

In July, 1912, after the retirement from business of the Monnig Shoe Co., the International Co. obtained possession of that plant in Marshall, Mo.

It is not necessary for me to discuss any other phase of this attack on the United Shoe Machinery Co., as applied to large companies, than simply to give the details which I have given of the organization of the International Shoe Co. It in itself, as far as it can be, is a combination intended to dominate the shoe-manufacturing business in the section of the South and Southwest which is tributary to its factories; and, as far as it has been able to do it, it has done so, so that to-day it is the largest shoe-manufacturing concern in the world. All of the attacks—and the records bear me out in this statement—that are made on the United Shoe Machinery Co. are made by concerns similar to the International Shoe Co., big people doing a large business, who want to get their machines at wholesale prices and under such conditions that the small manufacturer can not buy them. That is the animus behind this whole attack.

Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senate any longer in a discussion of this subject, except to read from a statement made by Mr. Frederick P. Fish, the great patent lawyer of Boston, one of the leading lawyers of the United States, in an argument which he made to the court in closing the case which the Government brought against the United Shoe Machinery Co., and I read it because it states in very definite terms the value of this company to shoe manufacturing. He has been discussing the reason for the attacks made on the company, and continues by saying—

And why? Simply because this defendant company has succeeded in doing what the public wanted; that is, in giving the best possible shoe machines, in organizing absolutely and radically new methods of dealing with and promoting the interests of its customers, in establishing new relations with them that were not foreshadowed, and which are not imitated to-day in any other business, in accordance with which this United Shoe Machinery Co. is the engineer for the shoe manufacturers; it is the organizer for the shoe manufacturers; it tells them how to lay out their shops; it tells them how to do their business; it trains their help; and it finances them to the full extent of the machinery which it supplies. Thirty-five million dollars of the property of the shoe-machinery company is in the hands of these shoe manufacturers. It finances them, as I say, to that extent. It keeps those machines in repair, so that the shoe manufacturers have no question of maintenance, no cost of maintenance to deal with. It in every way looks after their interests. It sees that information calculated to make the operation of the machinery more effective is collected and disseminated throughout the factories. It makes it possible for them to avoid that tremendous difficulty that is in the way of every manufacturer, of knowing what his costs are as far as his machinery is concerned, for there is no question of cost, no question of depreciation. The shoe manufacturers who deal with our company do not have to be on the watch to get the best possible machines. They know that the defendant will supply them with the best. They run no danger of making mistakes in their machinery. Everything is tested out to perfection before it comes to them. They know that their machinery is the best in the world, and that if better is devised they will surely have it.

I want to emphasize that by saying that when an improvement on a machine is made by the United Co., it takes out the old machine and puts in the new one without any cost to the manufacturer.

There is nothing for them to look after except the question of labor, the purchase of material, the design of their goods, and selling them. And there is, as I say, no business in the world which even imitates that of the defendant in these respects.

Mr. President, as I stated in the beginning, I have engaged in this desultory discussion of the business conducted by the United Shoe Machinery Co. because I do not believe the people of this country appreciate what is being done in the legislation which we are about to put on the statute books. Nobody knows what the result is going to be; but in a case of this kind, in an attempt to destroy what is termed a monopoly, which the courts are passing on or will pass on, we are going to do the very thing which will create a monopoly of the shoe-manufacturing business of this country as surely as the sun rises. That possibility should cause some halt to the endeavors to put this legislation on the statute books.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Before the Senator from Massachusetts takes his seat, I wish to say that I have listened with a great deal of interest to his argument, and to me it seems that he has certainly made out a case in favor of the benefits which can come from this machinery; but that being true, there is one thing that I can not quite understand. As I understand, the objection to these contracts is because of the provision which prohibits the lessor from using any other machinery than that of the United Shoe Machinery Co. in the manufacture of shoes. Now, if it is for the benefit of the small manufacturer to lease these machines instead of expending the money necessary to buy them, if they are the best machines that can be put upon the market, why is it necessary to have that clause in the contract?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan, who has been good enough to listen to a large part of what I have been saying, evidently was not present when I tried to explain that provision. In the first place, the only tying clause that applies to any of these machines applies to the three fundamental machines made by the Goodyear Co., the McKay Co., and the McKay Lasting Machine Co. The United Shoe Machinery Co. puts out about 300 machines altogether, and, with the exception of half a dozen machines, it offers to sell or lease any of these machines, or all of them, at the option of the manufacturers, who take them under the lease provision rather than buy them, because it is more economical for them to do it. It does not require as much capital to go into the business, and the net results have proven distinctly to the advantage of the manufacturer

It is only these three fundamental machines to which the tying clause is applied, and that is applied only because those machines are supplementary to one another. They are not in competition in any way. One does one thing in connection with the making of a shoe and another does another thing. Now, if one of these machines were operating on a shoe and the machine of some other manufacturer were employed in carrying on the operation, there might be such defects in the connecting link that the results would be unsatisfactory to the manufacturer himself.

I am not a shoe manufacturer and I am not an expert in these details, but at one time I did give a great deal of attention to this question, because it seemed to me there must be some reason why, in this particular industry, we dominated the whole world, not only in making shoe machinery, but in making shoes; and I came to the conclusion that it was due to the perfection of the machinery and the manner in which it was leased or sold to the manufacturer.

I do not know that there would be any result which would be harmful to the companies or harmful to the public if these tying clauses were entirely done away with; but, knowing the character of the individuals and the companies which are fomenting this attack on the United Co., I am fearful that they have in mind a combination in manufacturing shoes which will make the combination of the United Shoe Machinery Co., admitting that it is as bad as its detractors claim, look, not like 30 cents, but like 3 cents. [Laughter.]

I want to see the American people get good shoes at the lowest possible price, and I believe they are doing it under the system which now prevails.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. WEST. Before the Senator takes his seat, I have one question to ask. I see that the Senator is thoroughly familiar and conversant with the subject he is talking about.

My question is this: I understood the Senator to say that the United Shoe Machinery Co., in making and putting out these machines, requires the use of certain nails and wire, perhaps, that the machine uses. I understand why it would be necessary, if there was a given kind of a superior make, for them to use it, because it would result in the machine turning out superior work. Do they go any further than that in the requirements?

Mr. WEEKS. These requirements are only in the case of wire, nails, and eyelets used by the three fundamental machines to which I have referred. The Senator can see very well that there is ample reason for requiring that. If an inferior nail or an inferior piece of wire were used, the result would not be satisfactory to the user of the shoe, and the blame for the failure might be with some propriety laid to the machinery rather than to the material which was furnished by some one other than the maker of the machinery.

Mr. WEST. I understand that thoroughly, and it is entirely true; but what I wanted to know was whether the manufacturers of these machines went any further than that requirement.

Mr. WEEKS. Wire, nails, and eyelets are the only things to which it applies, as I understand it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, in discussing the Clayton bill and kindred legislation it is impossible to disassociate the subject from the distinguished Senator from Missouri. All through the discussion he has impressed his strong personality and his peculiar views upon the Senate. He was one of the chief antagonists of section 5 of the trades commission bill, which section condemns unfair methods of competition, and he brought to bear his admitted powers of debate and his skill as a parliamentary tactician to prevent that section from becoming the law of the land. The Senate and the House have both decided that proposition against him, and some of us fear that there are evidences in the debate upon the pending bill which indicate that he has not wholly adjusted himself to the new situation. It is useless for me to state that in discussing the report of the conference committee, or in any other discussion on the subject, I would not, even if it were necessary, make an assault upon him nor condemn him for any position which he has taken. The business of the Senate is to search for the truth, find every avenue for discovering truth, and then apply the truth in legislating for the people, and I have nothing to say about individual motives. Much as I disagree with the distinguished Senator's argument, I could not find it in my heart to fire even a dough bullet at him personally, and even though he has strayed away, in my judgment, from the true standards of legislation on the trust question now open to the Congress, I must admit that the Senator has made his circuitous road pleasant with song and poetry and has garlanded every by-path of nonessential with the choicest flowers of rhetoric. He has made even error plausible and musical, and has clothed his theories with a presentable coat, even though it be, like Joseph's, "of many colors." It is most fortunate, however, that Shakespeare did not write much law that is accepted by the courts of the United States in these modern days, and that we are now legislating for a hundred millions of people who have been happy for over a century under a Government in this Western Hemisphere, whose people separated from the mother country hundreds of years after that "winter of discontent" "followed by that glorious summer," put into the mouth of King Richard by Shakespeare.

These new people in this Western Hemisphere are trying the experiment of governing themselves, and, as has been well said, a government of the people is nothing but organized self-restraint. No people can succeed with a truly popular form of government unless they can put aside prejudices, both public and private, and can approach with a judicial mind the admitted facts which confront them at each stage of their progress. Every reform is complicated with conditions. Every step forward must be made over the prostrate bodies of prejudice, error, idols, and mistakes, and must keep in view the innocent along with the guilty, and must recognize that honestly acquired property is generally held by the same title as that which is dishonestly acquired. We can not divorce ourselves from what our fathers have been, and yet because they have worshiped idols or made mistakes is no reason why we should worship the same idols or make the same mistakes when we have discovered that they are real idols and actual mistakes. In other words, when we express a reform we can not shut our eyes to either the smallest or the greatest factor in the great labor, business, and commercial interests of the country which contribute to our prosperity. The United States Congress has the power, if it so desires, to make it impossible for any corporation suspected of being a trust to do business, but it could not do so by a law that did not apply equally to all business, little as well as big. This is a government of granted powers and of constitutional limitations. That Constitution goes to the protection of every person in the land, and we can not make laws that will put "big business" in a strait-jacket without applying it to "little business" similarly situated. Whether this bill shall fire dough bullets or 2,500-pound shells from siege guns, this Congress can not be the gunner that would have the deadly missile always pointed at "big business" and never at "little business." In the last analysis the courts will be the gunners and may determine the direction in which the gun shall be pointed. There never was a piece of constructive legislation enacted as to which criticism could not be made from some standpoint. It takes time and patience and even experiment to work out a great problem. Poetry and literature must play their part. They must point out the extreme cases and the excesses here and the injustice there, but when it comes to legislation we can not go every place where the heart would lead, but must follow the interpretation of the courts and keep ever before us the Constitution of our country.

Long ago the American people recognized that its vast resources, the ease with which money can be made, and the greater ease, after being made, that it could be concentrated, had put fabulous wealth in a few individuals and unheard of wealth in a few corporations, and that this power was interlocked in such a way as to make it a danger to the legitimate business of the country. Alongside with this conviction came another—that money making is not the whole purpose of life, and that along with prosperity there can be nurtured the higher ideal that recognizes manhood and its perfections as the highest worldly ideal after all. Twenty years ago the Sherman antitrust law was enacted. Probably every Senator upon this floor could repeat its provisions. All of us recognize it, and it is now so recognized by the country, as a great piece of constructive legislation, but that it lay almost dormant for several years; but when the necessity came, or was realized, its enforcement was all sufficient to meet the greater of the evils to which I have adverted. There is not a Senator on this floor who would repeal a single line or word of it for two reasons—first, because it has been indorsed by the country, and, second, because it has been construed by the courts as a general rule in such a way as to meet the situation which it was intended to cover. Anything which is a monopoly, or anything which in its nature may be used for monopolistic purposes, or anything which is in restraint of trade, is inhibited by the Sherman law, and a violation of that law is made a penal offense. So far as I am concerned, I have long ago satisfied myself why the great combines could not be curbed under that law. In an address made in my own State at least six years ago I am on record as saying that it was impossible to give the people perfect relief and to restore competitive conditions under the banking and currency system which this country then had. So long as it was possible for the money and banking combinations of the country to be manipulated against the small man in business and in favor of the big combinations that power alone would prevent the small man from building up a business that could be in any wise competitive to the larger combination. As long as it was possible to get all of the money that was needed in Wall Street upon New York, New Haven & Hartford stock, for instance, and at the same time it was impossible to get 25 per cent of its value upon well-improved city real estate, there was no use to talk about competitive conditions. It was for this reason that I looked upon the passage of the present banking and currency law as the greatest antitrust measure that it is possible for the Congress to pass. It puts it in the power of the Government to prevent the use of the Government's circulating medium in the interest of any section or any set of men or against any section or any set of men. Whenever the Government undertakes to furnish the people with a circulating medium—that is, with something to represent value and to make trading convenient—it assumes a trust whose responsibility can not be measured.

The people and the States are prevented from improvising any form of circulating medium which is at all practical. No matter how great may be the values upon which a circulating medium may be based, the Government practically said that it alone would attend to that duty, and, as I said before, it can be at once seen that that duty carries with it the high responsibility of seeing to it that it shall not be manipulated for the interest of anyone or of any section. The new currency bill is an approach toward absolute honesty and fairness in dealing with the circulating medium and is a guaranty to business that banks can not make it scarce and can not refuse to do their duty toward the trading public, and that stocks and bonds which may happen to be blessed by a few individuals shall not be the sole basis of credit. When this law shall be thoroughly understood and shall be put into practical operation under an administration dedicated to the cause of all the people and knowing no favorites, I have no doubt that the same genius, enterprise, and activity which have developed the steel, woolen, cotton, tobacco, and other businesses of the country will be applied to the building up of competition to those great combinations which have heretofore dominated those industries. Without absolute fairness in handling the circulating medium of the country the genius and enterprise of the people are stifled. With the new currency law properly enforced and fairly administered, business and trade will be infused with new life and will develop along new lines.

Indeed, there are great thinkers in this country who, I am constrained to believe reason correctly, contend that monopoly can not live under a fair banking and currency law; that if the Government of the United States will fully discharge its duty to the people in respect to the volume and flow of currency, there is no business which will not become almost at once competitive, and that it would then be impossible for any set of men to monopolize any line of trade. If we will look back over the growth of monopoly it will be seen that the genius and enterprise of the American people made the different businesses, which were later combined and now are the component parts of those combinations which we denominate "trusts." There was at one time a man named Carnegie, another one named Gates, another one named Schwab, and so on, in the steel business. These men all began business in a small way. They were quick to seize new methods of production which would give the finished product to the consumer at the lowest cost. In time we had the Carnegie Steel Co., the American Steel Co., the Federal Steel Co., and various other corporations, which were later organized into what is known as the United States Steel Corporation. But the United States Steel Corporation also has immense cash and credits. This is power. It is of itself a power with every bank with which it does business. It is itself a power with every corporation with which it transacts business. Without having a single director in any bank, that corporation can be powerful with the bank simply by the manipulation of its cash deposits. It can be powerful with railroads, except as prevented by the Interstate Commerce Commission, from the fact that it has immense freight to transport. It can be a factor in the coal situation, because it is a large producer of coal. It can have its influence upon the gas companies, because it is a large user of gas. But there are millions of tons of coal now produced and hundreds of thousands of acres of coal land not developed which it would be practically impossible for the steel company to control. There are vast areas of iron ore undeveloped and an ample tonnage that is developed which are not controlled by the Steel Corporation.

There are hundreds of men of genius and ability who would go into the steel business and manufacture steel in all its forms in competition with the Steel Corporation; but everyone knows that to do this would require immense capital, and there is practically no source of capital available to any independent competitor under our former currency and banking system. The power of the men in the Steel Corporation, and the power of the wealth of that corporation, could of itself create sentiment in the restricted available banking centers which would make the securing of capital practically impossible. Take the great tobacco business, which was called the "Tobacco Trust." That business was built up by men like the Dukes, Liggett & Myers, the late Paul Sorg, Reynolds, and others from small beginnings. These men of ability built up by hard work and native genius a large trade in tobacco. They catered to the trade; they manufactured the tobacco in such a way as to meet the demands of that trade; and each of them became wealthy. They were in every way successful. Later the money geniuses saw an opportunity to combine these different businesses and put them all into one corporation. When that was done the combination had immense amounts of cash. They had patented processes. The men connected with the trust were connected with large banking institutions, not alone as directors, but as stockholders, or as depositors and customers of banks, and this very power could be wielded under our old system of banking and currency. There are plenty of brains left in the country to organize competition. There is little or no trouble in buying tobacco. The same genius which formed the original constituent parts of the Tobacco Trust could go forward and make a success in the tobacco business again, but under the former peculiar banking and currency system of the country credits went by favors, and in nine cases out of ten the geniuses which built the businesses which together formed the Tobacco Trust would be compelled to go to their competitors to get the money with which to compete. It is so in every other business which has been controlled by a trust. The great banking centers of Boston, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, New Orleans, St. Paul, San Francisco, and Atlanta had banks not connected altogether by interlocking directors, but controlled by the masonry of money—the understanding that there were certain leaders whose approval was necessary to the flotation of any important undertaking. Anything which required a large amount of money and was taken to New York to be financed had to be approved by one of about three groups of corporations. If the proposition were taken to Boston, Boston would call up New York; if it were taken to Chicago, the same influences which controlled in New York controlled there. There was a network of owners and controllers of banks, and in a large measure the banks would not approve of anything which was condemned by this strong body of "captains of industry."

In 1907 a money panic and business depression came suddenly upon the country. Business became so stagnated that at one time during that depression there were over 400,000 empty railroad cars with nothing to do—a condition which was rarely seen before that time and has never been seen since. Men with money in bank were compelled to pay a premium to have their checks cashed in order to get the currency to meet pay rolls. In other words, "big business" and "big money" got frightened at about the same time, and they declared that business should stop, and it did stop. At that time a business man in the city of Wheeling, in my State, with an office building and grounds assessed at a quarter of a million dollars, with his building fully insured, could not get $50,000 in cash upon it. But this all-powerful combination of banks and big business would permit money to be loaned on stocks and bonds. For instance, a favorite stock at that time was the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. Any bank would lend money upon that stock, but not a cent could be gotten upon a solid, unchangeable security of a business block or other piece of real estate. The inherent error of the position of the banks at that time is now known, because the real estate is still a solid security, while some of the railroad stocks have proved to be of little value. Since the panic of 1907 there has been little permanent liquidation. The railroads have sold short-time notes; other large borrowers of money have borrowed upon short-time paper, and the fact is that since 1907 there has been no sure, certain, and permanent revival of business, and the banks and the business world know that that is the true condition. After years of education the people became convinced and the banks had to admit that our banking system was inadequate and that it was used not for the benefit of business and all the people, but largely for a few interests, and these were so consolidated and connected together that when a banker in New York became frightened the effect of his fear spread all the way to California and New Orleans, and other business men depending upon credit were materially injured thereby.

Therefore the most important constructive legislation which this Congress was called upon to pass was the banking and currency bill, in order that the bank reserves of the United States might be mobilized and then put into corps, regiments, and companies, officered by men selected by the Government, in order that this vast power might be used fairly and justly to serve the business of the United States. I repeat, Mr. President, that it is a crime for the Government of the United States to permit its supply of money to be under the control of any power on earth except that of the Government itself. The amount of money in circulation, the freedom of its circulation, and the fidelity with which credits are handled make the greatest power that was ever exerted upon business. It has power to take from a business man the savings of a lifetime. It has the power to build up one community at the expense of another. It has the power to build up one line of industry at the expense of another. It has a power as great as that of taxation; and no people can develop their industries, wealth can not be fairly distributed, unless the whole banking power shall be vested absolutely in and controlled by the Government, and the law be so framed that no private interest on earth can effectively exert itself in so important a matter. I still believe that when in full working order and when perfected, as it will be, the present banking and currency law will prove to be the greatest boon that was ever conferred upon the people. Besides guaranteeing to the honest banker freedom from runs and disaster it will guarantee to the honest business man credit, not when the money power chooses to extend it, but when he needs it and has the security to demand it. This reform will do more for the American people than all the trust legislation which could be enacted. Indeed, it will be a prime trust regulator and a trust buster. It will free the inventive genius and enterprise of the American people. It will take away the greatest power of the trusts to stifle competition, and it will put it in the power of the geniuses of the United States to utilize our raw material and to compete in every line of business.

This Congress could have well stopped with the passage of the banking and currency bill, and could have said to the people: "We have now freed business from unnecessary taxation and have now put the banking and currency and credits under the control of the Government. Go forward and develop the resources of the United States in absolute security that the money power can not manufacture money panics and take away from you the results of your genius and enterprise."

But both parties had some committals upon the subject of trusts. When the platforms of 1912 were promulgated no one dreamed that the present banking and currency law could be passed. Very few thought that such a reform would be possible. The declarations of the party platforms of 1912, therefore, upon the trust question approached that subject directly, little reckoning that there would be an inspiration in the shape of money legislation which would at one swing of the ax cut off the head of so many monsters. But, obedient to party pledges, the Congress took up the subject of trust legislation, and two bills came to this body from the other branch. One of these bills was the Trade Commission bill, a bill which was fully considered by both the House and the Senate committees and which assuredly was amply discussed in this body. The principal fight here was on section 5, which, as it passed this body, simply provided that unfair competition should be unlawful and then placed it in the power of the Trade Commission to determine what is unfair competition. That debate here was a most instructive one. There were those who contended that by prescribing what is unfair competition the courts would be restricted; that is, there would be considered by the courts only those things which had been heretofore condemned in England and in this country as unfair trade or unfair competition. The other view was that while the Sherman law condemned monopoly and restraints of trade, it said nothing about competition, and that unfair competition meant all of those practices by which one competitor sought to destroy another, and after destroying the other and then another, and so on, until he would get the field to himself, he would have a complete restraint of trade of everyone except himself and would have what is known as a monopoly of the business. Time and time again this Senate was challenged to define "unfair competition." More than one Senator undertook to do this, and when he had finished it was not difficult to point out other things or other expedients which had been adopted by the monopolist in order to get rid of a competitor. The general things mentioned at the time were cutting of prices, tying contracts, interlocking directors, and holding companies, and yet anyone can well see that there were dozens and dozens of other practices which would be just as despicable and which would be equally as effective in destroying a competitor.

The spy system, in my judgment, is the most offensive and one which by its very nature is criminal. I would much rather visit a criminal penalty upon one who employed spies in order to get at a competitor's business secrets for the purpose of injuring him than to put criminal penalties upon one who made what is called a "tying contract," or who cuts prices for the same purpose. The last two have long been regarded as legitimate, and while they are severe and now condemned, still they have been used by men of character and standing. The spy system, however, is the resort of the criminal minded. It speaks of crime because it is an underhanded system. It is a dark-lantern method that the high-minded man condemns. I would rather put in the penitentiary a man who controlled large deposits in a bank and who secretly requested a bank, and supplemented that request by a look or a nod that might be construed as a threat to withdraw deposits, to refuse legitimate credit to a competitor than to put in the penitentiary the man who happened to be a director of two or more corporations. I would rather apply a jail penalty to a rich man who built a few miles of railroad for the sole purpose of destroying the little railroad near by than to visit the same penalty upon the owners of a holding company. I mention these, however, in order to illustrate that unfair competition is like "reasonable doubt," "a reasonable length of time," "with malice aforethought," and many other terms that the law uses. It is easy to distinguish a case that is applicable when the facts are presented, but it is practically impossible to give a definition which would meet every case that could arise. A juror has no trouble in determining when there is a reasonable doubt, but about as near as the courts have ever come to defining it is to say that it is a doubt for which you could give a reason, and then, whether or not it is a good reason must be left to the conscience of the individual juror. "A reasonable time" is an expression that is most common. Sometimes six months is a reasonable time; in other cases three months; and in an emergency probably two days or a few hours would be a reasonable time; and yet throughout the affairs of men great transactions are determined without any other guide to the courts except the requirement of a "reasonable time," and the world has lived under that law without great inconvenience. In my State no one can be hanged for murder unless it is committed with "malice aforethought." No one can give a definition of that term that would cover every phase of the question, and yet men are hung, they are sent to the penitentiary for life, and the ends of justice are entirely met without any other criterion for so severe a penalty than is contained in the expression "with malice aforethought" or "with premeditation." After a full discussion in the Senate, which discussion was learned and able, the Senate determined on the passage of the bill and on consideration of the conference report that the general expression "unfair competition" or "unfair methods of competition," which mean the same, was amply sufficient, and it voted by a large majority to pass the Trade Commission bill with section 5 in it, containing no other guide than this general term. Now, under it would be included some of the following:

First. The subject of what is now section 2 in the pending bill, to wit, the cutting of prices.

Second. What is now section 3—tying contracts.

Third. What is now section 8—interlocking directors.

Fourth. What is now section 7—holding companies.

All of these practices were condemned in the bill as it originally passed the House, and were made penal offenses and penalties were prescribed. When the bill left the Senate and went to conference all of these penalties were taken out except that for "tying contracts." A substitute was drafted and introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Montana which was section 2 of the bill as it passed the Senate. In other words, the Senate and House have adopted a theory of handling those practices in competition which were not reached by the Sherman law; they condemned four of them specifically and all of them generally by section 5 of the Trade Commission bill, and had put a penalty upon but one, to wit, tying contracts.

Now, I submit, Mr. President, that upon any theory this is not scientific legislation, it is not fair legislation, and, with all respect, it is cowardly legislation. If tying contracts should be penalized in the first instance, so should interlocking directors, so should the financing of holding companies, so should price cutting. But when we have done that we are not half through the gamut of expedients adopted by the builder of trusts. Who can justify himself in making a tying contract criminal and not make criminal the act of employing spies to go into the business of a competitor and get his confidence and then his secrets; find out his customers, his sources of supply, and then use this information for the purpose of cutting his throat? This alone smacks more of criminality than does any of the others, and yet no one has attempted to make the employment of spies a penal offense.

I want to say in passing that it is a part of the history of this legislation that when this Congress approached the subject of trusts there were two theories. One was to create a trades commission to which should be referred all of those embryonic stages of restraint of trade and monopoly which had not developed far enough to come within the provision of the Sherman antitrust law. Another was to define them item by item, so that the courts in administering them could, from the definition in the statute, determine whether or not the facts brought the case within the provisions of the law. So far as this Senate is concerned that battle was fought out in the discussion of the Trades Commission bill, and when that bill was passed it determined the general provision that the Trades Commission, subject to review by the courts, should determine what was fair and what was unfair competition. The mind of man can not conceive of any monopoly or any contract in restraint of trade or any conspiracy to restrain trade which the Sherman law does not cover. Whatever may be done, the Sherman antitrust law should remain in full force and vigor, and no law which should now be passed must be construed as modifying or repealing that law. That is easily said, but not so easily done; and however strong may be the reasons for maintaining the Sherman law in its full force and vigor, because the courts have construed and the people have understood it, still it is not an easy matter to pass a law which deals with the subject without in some way destroying some of the effectiveness of the Sherman law. It is hard for the Congress to legislate upon a subject and then say that it does not intend to do anything of the kind. It is idle to proscribe a thing already proscribed and then put in a proviso that the second law shall not affect the first. It was on account of these considerations and the passage of the Trades Commission bill that both the Senate and the conferees found great difficulty in shaping the Clayton bill so as to make all of its provisions fit into existing statutes.

To go over an old subject very briefly, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Sherman law, in section 1, deals with the following subjects:

1. Every contract in restraint of trade.
2. Every combination in the form of trust or otherwise in restraint of trade.
3. Every conspiracy in restraint of trade.

In section 2 it deals with the following:

1. Monopolization of any part of interstate commerce.
2. Attempts to monopolize it.
3. Combinations to monopolize it.
4. Conspiracies to monopolize it.

The third section makes illegal every such contract, combination, or conspiracy.

If we adhere to the expressed will of the people and the evident purpose of Congress to maintain that law in its full integrity, so that the work of construing, applying, and enforcing the law, already done, shall not be questioned in any future litigation, it seems to me too plain for argument that we should be cautious in our definitions when we come to consider those practices which may come under the head of "unfair competition."

The House recognized this zone of danger in preparing sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 of the House bill.

Its definitions of illegal acts kept in view the broad scope of the Sherman law, as I shall show later on.

But, to return to my argument, there is another instance of unfair methods of competition which smacks much more of criminality and moral turpitude than either the making of tying contracts or the cutting of prices. There are cases in which a competitor has falsely labeled goods, adulterated them, and sold them as goods of the competitor. This practice is not only immoral, but it is so plainly a species of fraud that in an action at law there should be little doubt of the liability of the person guilty of it to the one who should be injured thereby. If done in interstate commerce, it would clearly come under the head of unfair competition, condemned by section 5 of the Trades Commission bill. It is very strange that so much eloquence has been expended upon the three or four pet theories dwelt upon by the opponents of this bill, and yet no one has presented an amendment covering the subject of false labeling and adulteration. One is compelled to marvel at the inconsistent demand that price cutting should be a penal offense and false labeling and adulteration should be left to the judgment of the Trades Commission. Another practice well known to business and to business men is the one of erecting a competitive business by the side of a competitor, and not by price cutting or tying contracts, but by the power of money and its use, in methods of delivery, in false advertising, and in dozens of ways that genius can invent and that wealth can execute, undermine and tear down the business of a competitor, not for the purpose of legitimate competition, but for the sole purpose of destroying the competitor. Another favorite way of destroying a competitor in transportation is to build a useless short line of railroad between two given points, not because the public needs two lines, not because it is the general plan of the transportation company to have another line, but for the sole purpose of destroying one of the lines which may become a part of a greater system of transportation. No one has asked to make that practice a criminal offense by this bill. Another unfair practice is that of deliberately closing the field of credit to a competitor. This need not be done by interlocking directors—not even by interlocking stockholders—but the large concerns can, by withholding or threatening to withhold patronage and deposits, prevent a bank or a trust company, at the crucial time, from extending legitimate and proper credit to a competitor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. If the last statement just made by the Senator be true, then is not the root and source of the evil the great power of these great corporations?

Mr. CHILTON. It is not the root of it, but one of the great sources undoubtedly.

Mr. REED. If it is the power of the great combinations to control the credit market so that another competitor can not exist, then is it not necessarily true that the source of the particular evil we are discussing lies in the great combinations?

Mr. CHILTON. Very largely that is true.

Mr. REED. Now, as to a concern which does that sort of business, which controls the credit market and crushes a competitor by any of the methods he has designated—local price cutting, spies, adulteration of goods, substitution of goods—does the Senator think any buccaneers engaged in that line of piracy ought not to go to jail the same as an individual who steals a horse or purloins a loaf of bread?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the Senator and I have never disagreed about that. The only thing is that I think I am logical and for one time in his life I think the Senator is illogical.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think——

Mr. CHILTON. Pardon me, let me finish this thought, and then I will yield.

Mr. President, somebody has to decide everything. The Senate in its wisdom decided that the Trade Commission should be the policy of the lawmakers. That has been settled. It was settled after one of the greatest debates that has ever been heard on this floor. I may say that because I did not take any part in it, and the distinguished Senator who is questioning me did. He took a most conspicuous part in it; he contributed to the sources of information, the knowledge, and the wisdom of that occasion. I was told by a man who looks into the discussions of Congress that that was one of the most enlightening and most able debates that it had ever been his pleasure to read, and he always did read the debates of the Senate. The Senate then adopted a theory. We can not take two. I say to the Senator that he can not sit here and in 12 months write down the different things that will come or that ought to come under the jurisdiction of the Trade Commission. In my judgment it is not logical to make one of them a penitentiary offense and not make all of them. The only logical thing for the Senator to do is to put in section 5 of the Trade Commission bill the provision that anyone who shall engage in unfair competition shall be guilty of a penal offense and shall be confined in the penitentiary. Then you take in everybody; you ought not confine that penal clause to one or two things, because just as soon as the trusts find out that you have condemned the few they will take some of the other courses to break up a competitor and will keep clear of the penal offenses. In other words, you simply confine the activities thereafter of the trust to fields in which they can get along very well. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator has gone so far from the remark he has just made that the remark I was going to make in reply would be practically without point now. But does the Senator think that if there are certain well-known acts which are vicious and bad and criminal in their nature we ought not to prohibit them and penalize them because there are certain other acts equally bad that we may not be prepared to legislate upon? Is that any reason? Should we sacrifice the passage and enforcement of that just law to stop an evil practice because we can not at the same time pass a law affecting all the evils?

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator decides the case in his own favor in his question by asking if we should not pass a just law. I am trying to show him that in a given state of facts it would not be a just law.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me there, because we get right to the point? Is it just to pass a law condemning a practice that is in its nature criminal? That is just, of course.

Mr. CHILTON. It is just if you can define it so as to reach it.

Mr. REED. And it is not unjust to pass such a law simply because you do not at the same time pass a law condemning some other practice. Is not that true?

Mr. CHILTON. It is true, with some limitations. If you are dealing with a subject, you should deal with it justly and comprehensively.

Mr. REED. Has the horse thief any right to insist that a law should not be passed against him unless there is at the same time one passed against the burglar? Has either one of these criminals any right to insist upon immunity because somebody else is not punished at the same time?

Mr. CHILTON. I think the Senator could well set it down that I would answer that in the negative; yet, in doing so, I do not admit his contention to be correct.

I could go on, Mr. President, and mention dozens, even scores, of things which have come within the condemnation of section 5 of the Trade Commission bill; many of them worse, many of them smacking more of criminality and underhandedness than tying contracts and meaner than interlocking directorates or any practices under them. My contention is that if one of them be criminal, the others must be; and that a law making only one of them criminal is not fair.

It is beyond the power of any man to name the unfair, inequitable, immoral, and malicious practices which the minds of men can invent and the use of money can execute, all willfully meant and intended to break up and ruin a competitor. The practice is modified in each instance by local conditions, by the situation of the competitor, his surroundings, and the network of conditions with which his business life may have surrounded him. It is sufficient to say that wherever there is a business there is always an opportunity whereby a stronger competitor can willfully and maliciously injure or destroy the weaker. The field for such work, to destroy a competitor, is as varied and as far-reaching as is the human intellect and the power of money. As we can not write down everything which would constitute fraud, that is no reason why fraud generally should not be condemned. Any reasonable man can recognize a fraudulent transaction when it shall be presented to him, so any fair-minded man can recognize unfair methods of competition when the facts shall be known, but no reason has ever yet been given, nor can one be given, why any one of these practices should be dealt with in a different way from any other. They are all species of underhanded, fraudulent, or malicious purposes. Unfortunately the Congress can not deal with unfair, fraudulent, or malicious purpose unless it be to regulate interstate commerce. Our powers here are limited to the regulation of interstate commerce, and the exact boundaries of our power have not been defined. Interstate and intrastate commerce go along hand in hand. Almost every business man engages in some interstate commerce, no matter how small the business may be. In his banking, purchasing, or selling some transactions will necessarily cross State lines, and from some standpoint the transaction will be interstate. We have to recognize that as to every corporation we have to deal first with the State. This Government is composed of 48 sovereign States, each having primarily the right to deal with its own corporations. Each State creates corporations. It gives them certain powers and exercises the jurisdiction of sovereignty over them. Subject to constitutional limitations which in most of the States mean nothing, because the State usually reserves the right even to repeal the law under which they are created, the State has full power over them. The laws of practically every State not only prescribe the powers which the corporation may exercise, but it regulates the number and power of the directors or controlling body, its meetings, how the stock shall be voted, and usually these laws provide for the qualification and the term of the directors and officers. In dealing with the subject of interlocking directors the question always arises, Where does the power of the State end, and where does the power of the Federal Government, whose right is limited to the regulation of interstate commerce, begin and end? If the United States Government has full power over corporations because they engage in interstate commerce, then the State has no power over such corporations. It is impossible that it can be true that there are two sovereignties in this country both of which can do as they please with a corporation engaged in interstate commerce. A corporation formed by a State makes its contracts under the laws of that State. It may mortgage its property under those laws. Its title to its property in that State is held under those laws, and the creditors in that State are entitled to the protection of those laws. Therefore in dealing with directors and all kindred matters concerning the management of the corporation some line had to be drawn defining the point at which the Federal Government could justly and fairly regulate a corporation created and controlled by a sovereign State.

Our power over it begins and ends with the clause of the Constitution giving us power to regulate interstate commerce. We can exclude certain kinds of organizations from interstate commerce. We could say that corporations organized in a particular way should not engage in interstate commerce. Our power to regulate is supreme and unrestricted over the commerce, but we have no power over the corporations except and unless we correctly rest the power upon the grant to regulate that commerce and see to it that the control exercised over the corporation is truly a regulation of such commerce.

In dealing with the subject I can not forget the enterprising, hustling thousands of workers and little-business men who organize for profit the orchard, oil, gas, coal, lumber, cotton, wool, mercantile, and trading companies for legitimate purposes, and who have no thought of monopoly, no purpose to injure anyone else. There are hundreds of thousands of these who may be interested in small banks and other enterprises in their localities, and they, of necessity, engage in interstate commerce. They build the houses, explore for oil and gas, open coal mines, run sawmills, produce apples, peaches, and grapes, start the small enterprises, and develop the country. Among these there are interlocking directors, maybe inoffensive holding companies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. To be candid, I was right in the middle of a thing which I thought was pretty good, and I wanted to finish it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wanted to install my poor contribution right in the middle of that cluster of jewels, if I might be permitted, but I will of course wait.

Mr. CHILTON. I can not forget what the inventor has done for man's convenience and comfort. In machinery, electricity, and chemistry the inventor has made nearly all things possible. The patent laws were intended to secure to him the benefits of his work and genius. By common consent of civilization he is entitled to the rewards which come to the originator. While condemning the tying contract, I do not want to make less valuable the invention and thereby take away the incentive to the highest achievement in original thought and work.

The theory of the House and Senate has been to preserve the Sherman law and not to injure any legitimate business, and to so frame the law that criminal business only would be impossible. We should be severe as to a known evil, radical with monopoly, but conservative with those things which must of necessity reach the small-business man. It is unwise and unfair to put every business man in fear. We should proceed upon the theory that business is lawful and that the great body of the people are honest. We should restrain dishonest methods without a blanket condemnation which the small-business man can not be sure fits his situation or not.

Now I will gladly yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I understood the tendency of the Senator's remarks at the moment I rose to be that interlocking directorates were something which should not be condemned.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, not at all. Do not get that into your head, because that would be erroneous, as the Senator will see later on.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say that there were a great many small concerns which had such directors.

Mr. CHILTON. If the Senator from Missouri wants me to anticipate myself, I will say to him that when you get to ordinary business matters which people must not do, you must be careful to define and say that only the fellow who does them with criminal intent or with a purpose that is against good policy shall be hurt. That is my theory. I do not want a net here that will catch everybody. The law should set its net only for the man who commits these acts with criminal intent and whose purpose is to do something which under the Constitution of the United States we have a right to forbid.

Mr. REED. But the Senator applies that to interlocking directors.

Mr. CHILTON. For that very reason, Mr. President, I think interlocking directors ought to be controlled under the Trade Commission bill.

Mr. REED. I want to call the Senator's attention to this plank in the last Democratic platform——

Mr. CHILTON. Unless the Senator wants to put it into the RECORD, I would say to him that I know it by heart.

Mr. REED. Well, I did want to put it into the RECORD.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not object to the Senator reading it; it is all right.

Mr. REED. It is as follows:

We favor the declaration by law—

Not by a trade commission or by any other kind of a commission, but by law—of the conditions upon which corporations shall be permitted to engage in interstate trade, including, among others—

Not the regulation, but—the prevention of holding companies, of interlocking directors, of stock watering, of discrimination in price—

I find no qualification of that language.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that his guide there for the time being does not mention "tying contracts." He is now contending that this conference report should be sent back in order to have a criminal penalty put upon tying contracts.

Mr. REED. I think it does. In the same plank of the Democratic platform——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator.

Mr. REED. This plank continues:

And control by any one corporation of so large a proportion of any industry as to make it a menace to competitive conditions.

I think that covers a tying contract, which is the very basis and soul of monopoly, and which, notwithstanding the ingenious argument of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] this morning in defense of the Shoe Machinery Trust, is the means employed by that trust by which it has built up its complete control over the shoe-machinery business of the country.

Mr. CHILTON. No; Mr. President, that plank of the Democratic platform does not cover tying contracts. Tying contracts were too well known to the men who wrote that platform for us to assume that they would not know the difference between a holding company and a tying contract. What is referred to there is the case of one corporation holding such control as to constitute monopoly, or else to the holding company. Of course, tying contracts were known, and they were not put into the platform, because possibly its authors did not think of doing so. We have denounced holding companies; we have denounced price-cutting; we have denounced interlocking directorates in this bill. It proposes to provide against that by law, and in what I claim to be the most effective way of securing relief. The Democratic Party is committed and probably the Republican Party, and, for aught I know, the Progressive Party; and probably everybody in this country feels that any party which seeks to get the confidence of the people is committed to the proposition of regulating these great combinations.

After all, the question is, How shall we do it? Shall we do it justly or unjustly? Shall we do it in a half-way manner, or shall we do it completely? Shall we do it comprehensively and scientifically, or shall we go at it bunglingly? My proposition is that we should go carefully in those directions which take us to unknown fields. When we know that our neighbors are involved, that the little banker, the little grocer and trader, the small business men in different communities are engaged in this kind of business, I am not afraid to say that I want to step lightly and be sure that we do not accomplish more harm than good.

I do not want anybody in West Virginia to feel that there is a possibility that the first knowledge he will have that he has violated the law will be a visit from the marshal to serve upon him an indictment found by a Federal grand jury. I, just as earnestly as the Senator or anyone else—and I have worked just as earnestly as anyone to frame a bill to that effect—want a bill that will describe the thing the trust does to injure the little man and make that act an offense and stop it. I want everybody to understand that I am not conceding that we are stepping easy with the trusts. We have provided a punishment that is designed to stop their evil practices and which will stop them. It is a voluntary assumption that any trusts favor this bill.

Mr. REED. What punishment is there provided in this bill?

Mr. CHILTON. I will show the Senator a little later on. I can not argue everything at once.

In regard to holding companies, the House adopted the following criterion as the one by which we should ascertain whether the corporation should come within the ban of the law; that is to say, holding companies should be inhibited "where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, is to eliminate or substantially lessen competition." In other words, the House dealt with the subject of competition, whereas the Sherman antitrust law dealt with monopolies and restraint of trade; and, as is admitted on this floor and conceded even by those who oppose this bill, there is not a case of monopoly or restraint of trade which is not completely covered by the Sherman antitrust law; and yet Senators every time we approach a subject or call to mind a particular practice want that ground covered again. We have everything covered now. The House criterion was that the condemned act must be such as "to eliminate and substantially lessen competition."

Why was that done? There was a reason for it. The House recognized, as every man who studies the question must recognize, that you can not interdict all holding companies in interstate commerce; you can not interdict all interlocking directors in interstate commerce. There would come here 90 per cent of the people to condemn us for doing anything of that kind. We would break up and destroy the little business of the country.

What we wanted to do was to get at the criminal and interdict the act when it was done for criminal purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, if that is what he wanted to reach and did reach, in the name of goodness why did he strike out the criminal penalty for the criminal that he was seeking to reach?

Mr. CHILTON. I did not strike it out. The Senator knows that I am not speaking for the Senate; I am not speaking for all of the conferees; I am not speaking for the House; and what I did in the Senate will be disclosed by my vote. I think, except on the Trade Commission bill, I voted as the Senator did. I have found, however, in this body, and in many others, that I can not always get what I want; and I am not disposed to break up the game because I do not win every heat. I am perfectly willing to take my medicine in this body, as I have had to take it everywhere else in life. When the Senate decided that it wanted a Trade Commission bill, I supposed they wanted to go down the gamut upon that theory; and when they decided that they wanted certain practices left outside of the criminal provisions, then my own sense of justice and my own idea of logic and right teach me that there is no good reason, with all respect to those who think otherwise, in providing that one kind of practice, and the least objectionable one, shall be a criminal offense, and leaving the greater ones to be regulated through a commission.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEST in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Is it because the Senator entertained that idea that the one criminal penalty that was put in the bill by the Senate with reference to trusts is not now found in the bill?

Mr. CHILTON. I will come to that in a moment and tell the Senator about it.

The Senate, however, Mr. President, adopted as its criterion the following, "where the effect may be to lessen competition." In other words, the Senate struck out "eliminate" and "substantially." My judgment is that there is very little difference between the two. To lessen is to substantially lessen. Competition is everywhere. A pleasant word, prompt and quick service are both methods of competition. If a competitor takes one customer away, it is lessening, and possibly "substantially" lessening competition; because when one customer shall be secured by one of the competitors to that extent there may be no competition. But when House section 8, which is Senate section 6, came to conference the House conferees insisted that the words "eliminate" or "substantially lessen competition" should be the standard. The Senate conferees insisted that the language of the Senate should be adopted, to wit, "where the effect may be to lessen competition." As always happens with men of ordinary sense, with men who want to carry out as best they can the instructions of their superiors, the conferees had to find some common ground upon which their minds could meet, and the result was a compromise, which is section 7 in the bill reported by the conferees. That compromise was the adoption of the words "may be" instead of the word "is," so that instead of reading "where the effect is" the bill now reads, "where the effect may be"; that is, where it is possible for the effect to be, which was a decided victory for the Senate. We struck out "eliminate," which was another victory for the Senate. We left in the word "substantially," which was a victory for the House; but the House conferees insisted that that would change the section and would not accomplish the purpose intended by it; that a corporation might acquire the stock of another corporation, and there would be no lessening of competition, but the tendency might be to create monopoly or to restrain trade or commerce, and therefore there was added to the definition the following: "Or to restrain such commerce in any section or community or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce."

Now, Mr. President, does anyone want to have any better law than that? There is a clear-cut rule fixed that will save the little man, and yet it will reach the people who are trying to break up their competitors. In other words, as regards holding companies, the bill as reported makes the holding of stock in another company unlawful "where the effect may be to substantially lessen competition or to restrain commerce or tend to create a monopoly." In my judgment, the language of the conferees is much better than the language adopted by either House; the definition is clearer, and gets at the evil intended to be corrected; and, to be perfectly candid with the Senate, I like it because it saves the small business man, who does not want to restrain trade and would not, if he could, create a monopoly.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. Why not add "and could not, if he would"?

Mr. CHILTON. I will accept the suggestion, and will add "would not, if he could." As to that man who could not if he would and who would not if he could, I am here to say I would not injure a hair on his head by any voluntary act of mine.

Mr. CLAPP. If he would not if he could and could not if he would, I should like the Senator to explain how this legislation in the form it passed either the House or the Senate could affect him?

Mr. CHILTON. It would not; and yet, Mr. President, I will say now that the Senator from Minnesota is so situated, he has been so educated, and the Lord has put such a heart in him that he would not if he could and he could not if he would commit murder, and yet I would not repeal the law of his State prohibiting murder, because there are other people who would commit that crime.

Mr. CLAPP. If I could not if I would and would not if I could, a law against murder would impose no burden or harm upon me. Just so with little business.

Mr. CHILTON. So far as I am concerned, the law of murder against the Senator from Minnesota hereby stands repealed; and if there were no one in the State where I live except men like the Senator, I would never attempt to enact such a law. Unfortunately, however, it is hard to find that kind of a community, and I do not believe that the Senator would claim that even Minnesota comes within that description.

In that same section there was a proviso put in by the Senate, as follows:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws nor to exempt any person from the penal provisions thereof.

That was put in, Mr. President, out of an abundance of caution. We did not want anything we said here to be construed in any place as repealing, altering, amending, or changing the Sherman antitrust law.

This was not entirely new matter inserted by the Senate, but was put at the end of the section in lieu of the following clause in the House bill:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall make stockholding relations between corporations legal when such relations constitute violations of the antitrust laws.

The purpose of the Senate was not to exempt any person from the penal provisions of the antitrust laws. The conferees adopted the Senate provision, but added "or the civil remedies therein provided," so as to make clear that nothing in the section should exempt any person from either the penal provisions of the antitrust laws heretofore passed or from the civil remedies therein provided.

Mr. President, I feel confident that that section as it came from the conferees was decidedly improved from any standpoint. I know that the junior Senator from Montana, after the bill went to conference, was very solicitous that this addition to the section to save the civil remedies should be made, and he called the attention of the conferees to the subject. In this, as in all matters connected with this legislation, he has been a most useful member of the Judiciary Committee.

Section 9 of the House bill was stricken out by the Senate, but the House insisted on it, but not in the original form. Instead of section 9 of the House bill, the Senate adopted section 10 of the Senate bill, which applied to common carriers; but instead of undertaking to regulate the matter of interlocking directors through the personnel of the board, it dealt directly with the evil, which was the objectionable transaction. It made it a criminal offense for certain officers of a common carrier to deal in securities or supplies, or make contracts with another corporation where there were interlocking directors and officers, unless the transaction was by competitive bidding under rules and regulations prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is dealing with an offense which can easily be described in an indictment and which ought to be prevented. If it had been the law, it would have prevented many of the transactions which have shocked the country. It does not put legitimate business in fear, and yet it makes it impossible for officers of a common carrier to traffic and deal with those who conduct both sides of the transaction to the profit of individuals who may conduct the negotiations. If a common carrier has bonds to sell, it can not sell them to a bank which has as its director or manager or purchasing officer anyone who at the same time occupies a trust capacity or is interested in another corporation with which the dealings may be had, unless the transaction is open and fair, and the common carrier, after competition, gets the best prices for the bonds, and in case the transaction is a purchase by the common carrier, unless it gets the lowest price for the articles purchased. It makes an exception to the amount of $50,000 in any one year, to cover those cases of emergency which would occur to anyone giving the subject any thought.

The management of common carriers has become a matter of acute public concern, and so has the financing of its securities. A scandal affecting the securities of a common carrier may be far-reaching. It has affected prices and has at times caused Europe to become uneasy over American securities as a whole. I want to see American securities standardized, so that this annual scare of European dumping of our securities will cease. This can be accomplished by enforcing honest, open methods in issuing and selling the securities and in purchasing and constructing by the common carriers. No honest management has anything to fear from this section, but it has a severe penalty that will deter the dishonest manipulator. Much criticism has been indulged over section 5 as reported by the conference committee. This was section 6 as passed by the House, which made the judgment in favor of the United States in a suit in equity conclusive in favor of any other party in any action or proceeding brought under the antitrust laws, but it was confined to suits hereafter brought.

I want to pause here a minute to say this to the Senate: I hope when Senators vote upon this measure they will recall the history of each section, see what the House passed, note what was reported to the Senate, observe what was done by the Senate, and thereby realize the restricted field which was left to the conferees as a basis for giving and taking so as to get together. If that is done they will see that the conferee's bill is nearer to the Senate bill and the Senate theory than it is to the House bill; that the Senate has gotten most of the things for which it contended. If this bill shall be passed, and it and the Trade Commission bill shall go along together, it will be seen that it is the theory of the Senate which is the law of the land and not the theory of the House. Section 5 of the Trade Commission bill was the guiding star of this legislation, and the conferees who had the bill in charge tried to mold and fit it to make it a logical whole, so that the country would have a piece of logical legislation upon the statute books, and not one that was top-heavy.

Section 6 as passed by the House made the judgment in favor of the United States conclusive, but it applied to suits "hereafter brought."

In other words, the House provision is subject to all the criticisms which have been poured down upon the devoted heads of the Senate conferees. The House provision would not have applied to any suits heretofore brought or concluded or to any suits now pending. The suitor who wanted to use the judgment in any antitrust case in favor of the Government would have had to wait for the judgment to be entered in suits in equity brought after the passage of the bill under the House provision. The Senate committee reported section 4 of the Senate bill, which made judgments in suits in equity or in criminal prosecution prima facie evidence, and provided that it should apply to final judgments heretofore or hereafter rendered. There was a radical difference between the House provision and that of the Senate. The House provision applied entirely prospectively; that is, to suits hereafter brought. The Senate provision made it apply to judgments heretofore or hereafter rendered. The House provision made it apply only to suits in equity. The Senate provision made it apply to both suits in equity and criminal prosecutions, and the House provision made the judgment conclusive, while the Senate provision made it prima facie evidence. I never heard any demand from the people for either provision. The only demand which I have ever heard from litigants and attorneys representing litigants was that the evidence taken by the Government in a prosecution against a trust might be available for a private suitor on the ground that the Government is able to get evidence which the private suitor could not. The demand was that the evidence be admissible against the same defendant where it was otherwise competent. Both section 6 of the House bill and section 4 of the Senate bill went further in some respects and not so far in others, as was my understanding of the demands of the situation. It is my judgment that there would come more relief to those who would be injured by the violation of the antitrust laws if the provision had been that any evidence taken in any trust suit by the United States should be available against the same defendant when certified by the clerk of the court. This would give a litigant a right to the evidence regardless of the outcome of the case. It would give no more effect to that evidence than would be given to it if it had been taken in open court in the second litigation, but it would enable suitors to get evidence which otherwise they could not procure.

The conferees had to deal with these two wide-apart provisions. The House conferees insisted upon section 4 and we insisted upon the Senate provision. The matter was debated and considered, and the only thing that was possible was section 5 as it now appears. Section 5 applies both to a criminal prosecution and to a suit in equity. That far it was a decided victory for the Senate. It made it apply to judgments hereafter rendered and not to suits hereafter brought, likewise a Senate victory. It retained the prima facie provision as provided in the Senate section, another Senate victory. However, it was recognized that heretofore consent judgments and decrees had been entered, and it seemed to the conferees that where defendants had gone in before the passage of this bill and had consented to a decree as demanded by the Government, it was hardly fair to give that decree the force and effect which should be given to one which had been tried out; and inasmuch as it was the purpose of the bill to be practical, and knowing that suits were now pending, it was thought nothing but fair that where the defense surrendered and consented that the Government should take a decree without any evidence the section as adopted by the conferees would be fair to all parties, but it was further recognized that there are suits now pending in which evidence has been taken, and if these defendants should come forward now and consent to judgments in favor of the Government they would be in a worse position than those who should consent where evidence has not been taken. Therefore it was provided as a compromise that the section should not apply to consent decrees where no testimony had been taken, nor should it apply to consent decrees where evidence had been taken if the defense now surrendered and took no further testimony.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. I do.

Mr. REED. Of course, the entire virtue of this section lies in the ability of the Government or the private citizen in subsequent litigation to use as evidence the decree which has been rendered. It has no other effect than that. Of course, the private litigant having a suit does not make out a case by merely showing the decree. He must show that he has been injured. The Government in any subsequent litigation does not make out a case in its second suit by showing the decree in the first. It can only use that as one fact. It must, however, proceed to show that the corporation or combination is still violating the law.

I want to ask the Senator this question: If a private citizen has been injured by a combination, ought he not to be permitted to use in evidence against that combination every admission it has ever made?

Mr. CHILTON. I doubt very much whether that would be true in everything. My idea is this: My whole theory—and, as the Senator knows, the one that I contended for all the time—is that neither the House bill nor the Senate bill gave the people what they wanted. What the people wanted was the evidence. They did not ask us to make it prima facie evidence or to make it a finality. They will take care of that. Hardly anybody sues a trust that has not a good case, and if he makes out a good case the courts and the juries will so decide.

What the people wanted was to have the benefit of the investigation which the Government had made and the evidence which was on file in the case. They wanted us to let the evidence there be certified and used against the same defendant. That is all they asked us to do, and with that evidence they can take care of the litigation.

Mr. REED. But does the Senator think that any combination ever stood up in court and pleaded guilty when it was not guilty?

Mr. CHILTON. I think not.

Mr. REED. Now, if it was guilty, and if it admitted its guilt, and if a private party had a suit against that concern for damages, why should not he be permitted to show that this institution had admitted its guilt? What harm can be done, what rule of law outraged, what principle of equity infringed upon?

Mr. CHILTON. I do not know of any, but——

Mr. REED. Then why not leave in the word "heretofore"?

Mr. CHILTON. Simply because, as I said before, I am not the Senate of the United States, nor is the Senator from Missouri the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED. No; but the Senate put in the word "heretofore."

Mr. CHILTON. That is right; and the Senate has passed a lot of things that the House has not agreed to. The Senate has passed many bills which have not become the law of the land. I am telling you what occurred in the conference. We have brought you here the very best that is possible. I am giving the Senate the reasons why it was done. I am trying to show the Senate that it is an improvement upon existing law. It is not for me to lecture the House, nor is it for me to lecture anybody on the conference committee. I tried my best to get what the Senate directed me to contend for. My colleagues from the Senate on that committee did the same thing; but we thought the object of a conference was to agree on the very best thing possible and to come the very nearest we could to what the Senate desired the law to be. We have reported it.

It is useless to ask me my views. I am giving the conferees' views and trying to show the Senate that this is better than the present condition; that this is an improvement; that this will help. Even if the Senator be right in all that he contends for, he will find out, as I will find out, if we stay in this body, that there are many things which we would like to have that we can not get; and there will be many a time when we will vote for a bill that never will be written on the statute books.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. CHILTON. I can not tell you why. I can only say to you that we could not get all that the Senate wanted. We tried to get the bill as it was passed by the Senate, and we could not do it. There was another side to the proposition.

Mr. REED. What argument can be advanced——

Mr. CHILTON. I do not want to advance any argument against it, and there is no need to argue for it. I voted for it. I voted for the bill as it passed. I voted as the Senator did on many things, and I voted for the bill as it left the Senate. I tried to keep that section in as it was passed by the Senate, and I could not do it. We have to take this or defeat the bill. We can not get anything else out of it. It is a good section, though, Mr. President, and confers a great deal of benefit; and, after all, the contention is that we should not deal with things in a retrospective way. If we can get the future right, we can well let the past take care of itself. That was the theory that was adopted, and we could not get any more. I have an abiding faith that the section as now reported is just and fair.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to have some suggestion of the authority upon which the Senator says we will get this or get nothing.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, well, I withdraw that statement. I was just giving my opinion.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask because in the bill as it passed the House there were several very valuable features which went out in conference; and we can hardly assume that the House would defeat the bill if it were sent back for that reason.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes; because the situation was entirely changed. The Senator knows that after the House and the Senate passed this bill the President signed a bill establishing an entirely different theory on these things and putting them into the hands of the Trade Commission. The House could very properly, in my judgment, change its position, and could not be logical and consistent unless it did change the theory upon which it legislated in the first place. My view all the time has been that after the Trade Commission bill was passed we could not be logical, we could not be fair with ourselves and the other House, unless we changed our theory of handling these matters.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that is true as to those things that would then conflict with the Trade Commission bill. The House, however, put in this bill a provision relating to tying contracts. The House put in a provision relating to underselling. The conferees have kept in those things, but they have changed the terms of them. If they were in conflict with the Trade Commission bill, they had no business in this report at all.

Mr. CHILTON. I am not so sure that they should be in; and it seems to me that everybody who will study the question will say that this body can not justify itself in selecting one of them and making it a criminal offense and leaving probably hundreds of other things to be dealt with by the Trade Commission. That is what I mean.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, Mr. President, I, for one, can not let that statement go unchallenged. The fact that you can not interdict one thing is no reason why you should not interdict another, if it ought to be interdicted. There is no getting away from that.

Mr. CHILTON. Of course, in the abstract, what the Senator says is correct. Applied, however, to what he and I were talking about, it is absolutely wrong in principle and can not be justified upon any theory of logic. The abstract statement is all right; but, applied to what he and I were talking about, I dissent from it in every particular.

This section is clearly a compromise between the divergent views of the two Houses. It may be said for the Senate that there is more of the Senate provision retained than there is of the House provision. It may be said, in conclusion of this matter, that section 5 is an effort at justice and fairness, and is intended to give a remedy to suitors who may not be as able as the Government to secure evidence. The provision takes no unfair advantage of anyone, but it does encourage those corporations who want to conform to the ideas of the Government and who desire to adjust their business and dissolve the combination in accordance with the demands of the Government. There is even an inducement that they should do so. This takes nothing from anyone. It is new matter and grants a privilege and a right to those injured by monopoly. The fact that we could not get all that the Senate may have wanted is no reason for defeating the bill and depriving the litigants of a substantial benefit.

Much comment has been made upon the striking out of the statute of limitation in section 4 as passed by the Senate. It has been assumed upon this floor that it will curtail the statute of limitation. That is erroneous. As the law now stands there is no general statute of limitation as to suits in equity in the United States courts. They are regulated by analogy to the statutes of the several States. As to most of them, the six-year period would shorten the time in which suits could be brought. The conferees could not agree upon a period, and finally, to settle the matter, that part of the provision fixing an iron-clad statute of limitation was stricken out. The law is left just as it is now.

Just to show, now, how the attacks upon this bill go, it has been assumed here because we cut out the statute of limitations of six years that that is in favor of the trusts; in other words, that it gives the Government less time in which to prosecute or bring a suit. Absolutely the contrary is the case. As the law now stands, there is no general statute of limitations as to suits in equity in the United States; and in my State such a suit would be barred only by analogy to the statute of limitations if the court should enforce it, or upon the general rule of laches, which, I take it, would never go against the Government. The statute of limitations now is left as it is in the States. There was a disagreement as to whether it should be four years or six years or longer, or less, and we could not agree upon it. Inasmuch as we have gotten along very well with the statute of limitations as it is, and we could not agree on the change to be made, we just struck it out and had no legislation at all on that subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I am not willing to let that comment go in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. I do.

Mr. REED. The Senator's statement that there is no statute of limitations in equity suits is true. As far as the Senator's statement went, it was probably correct; but the clause that was stricken out, and the elimination of which I objected to, covered criminal as well as civil cases.

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, well; I understand that. The Senator is correct.

Mr. REED. And it did extend the statute of limitations in a criminal prosecution from three years to six years.

Mr. CHILTON. That is correct.

Mr. REED. That was stricken out, although the Attorney General had expressly requested it.

Mr. CHILTON. That is right; and I voted for it, and would vote for it now if we could find any way to get it in here; that is, if we could be the House and the Senate at the same time.

Section 8 of the bill as passed by the Senate was carried in the bill as section 9 of the conference report. There was a slight amendment made to it. The bill as passed by the Senate makes it a crime to embezzle or willfully misapply the funds of a corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier, or any property or funds arising or accruing from such commerce. The amendment made it apply not only to funds "arising or accruing from," but also "used in" such commerce. It was only an effort to place the law clearly within the powers of the Congress. I will say in passing that that section and section 10 are submitted to the Senate as provisions having "teeth" in them.

Mr. President, the guiding star of the conferees was that it was the purpose an intent of both the Senate and the House that there should be no modification of the Sherman antitrust law. That has been construed by the courts, and when properly executed will reach the great combinations which have distressed commerce. In so far as that may fail, the new currency system will supply the deficiency, and the business of the United States will be hereafter free, if the laws shall be properly executed. This bill was not intended by either House to abolish trusts and monopolies, but to catch certain practices in their incipient stages and prevent them as far as Congress had jurisdiction so to do. This and the Trade Commission bill were intended to stop the practices which lead to monopoly. Certain well-known practices, price cutting, tying contracts interlocking directors, holding companies, are put in his bill in answer to platform declarations, and the true test of our jurisdiction to control them is written in the bill. After the House bill was passed the Trade Commission bill was put upon the statute books. That of necessity would modify the situation, because it was in this Senate that section 5, which denounced unfair competition, was put into the Trade Commission bill, and thereafter it became a question of determining whether or not—full jurisdiction having been given to the Trade Commission to deal with this subject—any of them should be dealt with as criminal offenses in this bill.

The Senate decided that only one of them should be made a criminal offense. That was tying contracts. The conferees on the part of the Senate could not retain that one criminal provision in the bill. The Senate conferees never at any time surrendered a position taken by the Senate where it was possible to retain it. The conference committee worked for many weeks, every day, and the conferees upon the part of the Senate did everything in their power to induce the House conferees to take the Senate bill section by section as it was passed by the Senate. It is injustice to use the word "surrendered" in this debate. I submit that it is unfair to the Senate conferees to make the deduction that there was any weakening upon the part of the Senate conferees. A conference necessarily means compromise. The very purpose of a conference is to report back to the two Houses the matters upon which the conference can agree, if possible. If the Senate wanted the House bill, the Senate had an opportunity to take it; but the Senate having discarded the principles of penal offense for these embryonic trust practices, the conferees upon the part of the Senate could see no reason for selecting one of the practices and making that a criminal offense and not doing so as to others even more reprehensible. Therefore the conferees adopted a way to reach a conclusion, dictated by reason; and the conferees submit again to the Senate the proposition that no one can give any good reason why tying contracts should be made a criminal offense and all of the others, even more reprehensible practices, which I have mentioned should be referred to the Trade Commission.

If the Trade Commission shall do its duty, the road to be traveled by those who engage in unfair methods of competition will be a most difficult and hard one. The guilty party can be put in jail until he does desist. The remedy is full and effective to meet the situation and stop the practices, and that, after all, is the purpose of the law. It leaves the Sherman antitrust law in full force and vigor, and it meets, in a sensible, practical way, those well-known methods of unfair competition which breed and develop the trusts. But this bill does even more: it settles forever all of those controverted questions affecting labor which have weakened the prestige of the Federal Government, and which have created a feeling among the people that the Federal courts have hidden powers that deprive men of their rights. This bill gives the right of jury trial in contempt cases and defines the things which Federal courts may enjoin and the things which they may not enjoin in labor controversies.

It has been said that this is class legislation. It is nothing of the kind. It is simply defining the policy of the United States for its courts in a State. If we should take away the power of injunction in labor disputes entirely from the Federal courts that is depriving no one of a remedy. The State courts are still open. It is a very small percentage of cases of this kind of which the Federal courts have jurisdiction anyhow. It so happens that in labor disputes sometimes one set of cases will be in a State court and another in the Federal court. This necessarily brings about friction. We would deprive no one of his remedy by taking away the power of injunction in such cases from the Federal court. This, however, has not been done. The holdings of the best of the authorities have been followed and the right of jury trial has been preserved. This will tend to create a better feeling; but whatever may be said about it it is in accordance with the Democratic platform and promise and is a full redemption of that promise. Employer and employee will now understand their rights. A nonresident person or corporation going into a State can now understand what the Federal court practice is in labor disputes. If he chooses to go into a jurisdiction which all of the other residents of that State can not invoke, he must do so under the rules laid down in this bill. Hereafter there will not be one rule in one district and another rule in another district. This applies to all Federal courts wherever they may be, and if a nonresident person or corporation does not like it the State courts are open to him as they are to the citizens of the State where the suit may be brought.

Section 15 of the House bill and section 16 of the Senate bill, which is section 17 of the conference bill, have been commented upon. This section 17 is practically the same as rule 73 of the Supreme Court rules. It has been said here that a secondary boycott is legalized by this bill. That is not correct, but whatever is legalized and whatever it may be called, these provisions are in the interest of justice and fair dealing and give to the courts all the power which the Federal courts should assume in any State. The bill simply prevents Federal courts from enjoining a person from doing what he might lawfully do and prevents such courts from enjoining a person from attending at any place where he may lawfully attend for a lawful purpose, and it does take labor and certain agricultural organizations from the ban (?) of the Sherman antitrust law so long as they conduct their organizations not for profit and without capital. This is putting into the law what was the understanding of it at the time it was enacted and what is the understanding of the best courts of the land now.

The labor provisions and the injunction provisions had little or no opposition in either branch of Congress. There is now an opportunity to settle these important matters and take them from the field of political agitation. It will be difficult to convince organized labor and the business men who want these questions settled that the Congress is in good faith for the injunction and labor provisions if the bill shall be defeated upon the ground that a penalty is not provided against the offense of tying contracts, that section 25 was stricken out, and that a few changes in phraseology were made in other sections.

The general scope of the things which are to be made illegal has been agreed upon. It is a forward step in reform and our promise to labor has been redeemed.

Now I come very briefly to two other sections, and then I shall have done.

There were two sections added to this bill in the Senate, one upon the motion of the junior Senator from Missouri as section 25 and one upon the motion of myself as section 26. My section 26 shared the same fate in the conference committee as his section 25; both were stricken out. I violate no confidence when I say, after the most vigorous argument I could make and after marshaling the strongest reasons for its passage and answering, as I thought, conclusively, all the arguments made against the section, I was humiliated to find that my section 26 shared the same fate as did the old colored man in my State who ran for mayor—it got but one vote, and I know who cast that vote. All of the other conferees on the part of both House and Senate refused to consent that section 26 should become a part of the law of the land.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is very interesting——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I had understood that it was the part of our conferees when they went into conference to battle for the things the Senate had done. We are now informed that the only vote cast in favor of section 26 was cast by the Senator himself.

Mr. CHILTON. That was on the final vote. From the time when we first went into conference to the last hour of the last day the Senate conferees contended for the Senate bill as a whole and each one of the sections as a whole. Of course, while this was true of the initiative steps, it can be seen that if the Senate conferees and the House conferees had insisted on their respective measures in their entirety we would never have gotten the bill through. I mean to say, that when the final vote came mine was the only vote in favor of retaining the section.

I may be wrong, but I never could see any reason why Congress, whose powers over the subject of keeping the channels of interstate commerce clean are supreme, should do anything or permit anything to be done under its sanction which is obnoxious to the laws of a sovereign State. I have always been in favor of an amendment to our internal-revenue laws which will stop the practice of the Government laying a tax upon a business which is outlawed in a State. In my opinion it is an insult to levy a tax upon a local business in that State, and thereby, in a sense, giving national sanction to the running of that business, when the laws of the State prohibit the business from being carried on within its borders. It tends to create friction; it discourages the enforcement of law in that State; and necessarily creates a feeling that the Government is a thing apart from the people, when our purpose should be to have the people of every county in every State love and respect the Federal Government. Likewise, I condemn the practice that one State should create a corporation and send it forth to do business in all of the other States, but prohibit it from doing business in the State which created it. Likewise, the Federal Government should pass no law which of itself legalizes the transaction of any business contrary to the laws of the State where the business is to be carried on. I expressed this idea as well as I could by section 26, and in order to make it free from any objection which was raised, I offered to amend the section so that it would not apply to those cases in which there could possibly be any conflict between the laws of the State and those of the Federal Government; for instance, to meet those cases wherein it has been held that where the Government of the United States has jurisdiction to legislate upon the subject, and does so, as in the case of navigable waters as part of interstate commerce, then, that the laws of the United States should always be supreme, notwithstanding any law of a State to the contrary. This would have met every objection which I have heard raised to section 26 as passed by the Senate; but, as I said before, the conferees disagreed from me, and instead of fighting this whole bill and depriving business, labor, and the public generally of the benefit of its many salutary provisions by defeating the whole bill, which a vote against the conferees' report will do, I surrendered gracefully and am willing to take the bill notwithstanding that I did not get all I wanted.

This brings me to section 25, the pet of the junior Senator from Missouri. In my experience with him in this Senate and upon the Judiciary Committee, I have learned that he is a great lawyer as well as a wonderful advocate. He has the legal ability to prepare a much better section, and has qualities as an advocate to defend a much worse one. The Senate conferees did their full duty as to section 25. It was only on the last hour of the last day of the conference that the Senate conferees finally yielded as to section 25, and it was stricken from the bill. We considered ourselves in duty bound to do so, though I must be candid and frank with the Senate, and this compels me to say that after an investigation of the subject and after hearing what the House conferees had to say, I was convinced that section 25 is, to say the most of it, a piece of doubtful legislation. In the first place section 25 singles out the monopoly or combine in restraint of trade and leaves out of the section other things in restraint of trade. There is brought within the purview of the section only the case of a corporation which shall acquire or consolidate or control the plants or property of other concerns. I doubt very much whether it would reach the holding company, but for the sake of the argument let us assume that the word "control" would reach the holding companies. The objections which were raised to the section were, first, that it is a direction to the court to prescribe a given remedy regardless of the circumstances surrounding the case. In other words, it compels the court not only to decree a dissolution but to appoint a receiver and wind up its affairs and cause all of its assets to be sold in such a manner and to such persons in order to restore competition as fully as it was before the corporation or combination began to be formed. It was argued with force that this was a reflection upon the courts, and was an assumption by Congress that the courts will not do their duty, if not a charge that the courts had not done so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. I think when I get through the Senator will find——

Mr. REED. I merely wish to ask the Senator if he does not think it is true that the courts have not done their duty in a great many instances.

Mr. CHILTON. I have lost many cases, and I have exercised the privilege of going behind the house and making a few remarks that may not be worth repeating regarding what the court has done, and I have condemned the courts in individual instances about as much as anyone, but there always comes a time when we forget those things. The softening hand of time brings us around to read the old record, to read the other fellow's brief, and we get a judicial temperament again. After all, as a rule, I would say that the courts do not decide cases wrong. I do not think the courts get wrong any oftener than probably we Senators do. I do not think they get wrong any oftener than other people do. I would dislike to think that I live under a Government where, as a rule, the courts are either ignorant or corrupt. I know the Senator does not think that; but I think they do often make mistakes; I think they do err just about like the common run of humanity. They make mistakes, and they may do foolish things at times.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think it is a reflection upon the court for the lawmaking body in passing a law to prescribe the penalty?

Mr. CHILTON. In regular order I will say what I think on that point. I lay it down as a proposition that a court which will not honestly and effectively dissolve a combination after ascertaining that it is unlawful within the meaning of the Sherman law would be the kind of court which, to save the corporation, would refuse to find it guilty under a statute which fixed an unvarying decree to be entered. In other words, if the court will not be honest in administering the relief it would not be honest in deciding the facts, and if there were a court which wanted to save a corporation it could do so effectively by refusing to find it guilty, and would do that if the effect of finding it guilty would be to compel a decree required by Senate section 25.

The Sherman antitrust law requires the court to decree a dissolution, and the courts have been doing this by injunction; that is, the courts have been enjoining the different parts of the combination from acting until brought within the court's view of competitive conditions. It was the judgment of the conferees, therefore, that Congress would be going a little too far to say that it could not trust the courts of the United States to enforce the law. But the answer to this is that that is what the law does in fixing any penalty; and the response to the answer is that the Sherman law fixes a penalty for the violation of its criminal provisions; and that is after a trial by jury; and that terrible time has not yet come when we shall have the same severe judgments in civil causes which are provided in criminal cases after a verdict of a jury.

But there is a second objection which was raised to this section, which, to my mind, was most convincing, and that was that it might be a serious injustice to innocent men and might bring the laws of the United States in contempt in the States. Take, for instance, a combination which is made up of a New Jersey corporation which buys 60 per cent of the stock of a corporation in Massachusetts, 60 per cent of another corporation in West Virginia, and 60 per cent of another corporation in Missouri. Before it purchased this controlling stock of the three corporations the Massachusetts corporation had executed a mortgage upon its property to secure creditors by bond issue or otherwise. The West Virginia corporation may have leased property in West Virginia, and may have purchased property and issued bonds secured by a mortgage upon it. The Missouri corporation may have owned valuable franchises and rights and real estate in Missouri and had executed a mortgage upon its property. In addition to this, there may have been judgment liens upon the property of the corporations in each of the States, and their creditors or leinors would be entitled to participate in the assets of the corporation. We seriously doubt the power of a court of equity to do complete justice in a final winding up of these affairs to the creditors and lienors and security holders of the individual corporations. If the suit which the Government brings is not a creditor's suit, it does not marshal the assets of the corporation, nor does it convene the creditors.

As I understand the law, it is only in exceptional cases that a receiver appointed in one State, even by a Federal court, has jurisdiction outside of the State in which he may be appointed. I know that in the case of a railroad running through different States it has been held that the appointment of a receiver in one State will operate to put the whole property in the hands of the receiver upon the ground of necessity, it being held in that kind of a case that the property must be run as a whole, and that the receiver first appointed and taking possession has the right to the possession of the whole assets and to the whole line of the railroad in order to run it as a going concern, each one of the parts being dependent upon the other and it being impossible to run successfully a part of a railroad except in connection with every other part. But even in those cases the usual practice is to apply to the courts of each State in ancilliary proceedings and have the courts of every State through which the road may run to recognize the original receivership of the court which first acquired jurisdiction. There is another line of cases wherein the courts have held, as in the Charter Oak and Iron Hall cases, that the courts of the State which create the corporation and which provide for the appointment of a receiver could appoint such receiver, and that his jurisdiction would extend into any State in which the property of the corporation might be. That theory was sustained upon two grounds: First, upon the ground that everyone dealing with the corporation was in duty bound to know the laws of the State which created it and that those laws were part of the contract which was entered into by everyone with the corporation, and that since those laws provided for the manner of appointing a receiver and winding up its affairs, when that law was complied with and the receiver was appointed he stood in the same attitude as a voluntary assignee in every State where there might be property of the corporation. It was further sustained upon the ground that complete justice could not be done to all of the stockholders, policyholders, and creditors of such a corporation by having its assets administered by several courts in different States, and in the very nature of the case complete justice could not be done to all parties interested except in one court where all of its assets could be marshaled and all of the creditors might be convened and the rights of all the stockholders and policyholders could be adjudicated.

It is a most dangerous piece of legislation, in my judgment. While I voted for it with the Senator from Missouri, and it struck me as being a good remedial piece of legislation, still when these facts and arguments were presented to me, notwithstanding the fact that I insisted upon it as one of the conferees of the Senate, I must say that when the argument was over I did feel that, in my judgment, the agreement of the conferees was the best thing to be done, and the most that I could say of it was that, in my judgment, it is a very doubtful piece of legislation.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say in conclusion——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator allow me to remark, in view of his recent statement, it is not difficult for me to tell how I lost my case when my counsel became so thoroughly convinced that I was wrong, and I should like to have the privilege of employing at least associate counsel before judgment was entered by consent.

Mr. CHILTON. Still, after all, in view of the peculiar duties which we have to perform here in legislating, one of the first things about it is that we shall be frank with each other, and if I feel that way I can not pretend to the Senator that I feel another way. It is for the Senate to determine whether or not the objections which I have frankly, candidly, and fully given here are not substantial ones. I have great faith in the ability of the Senator. I have found that when you convince him that he is wrong he is fair enough to admit it. I admire the way he fights. I admire the way he stands by a proposition. But, Mr. President, I think that the reasons that I have suggested here are so strong and so cogent that before this is over the Senator is going to say that, as now drawn, his section 25 is not only dangerous, but it is an impracticable piece of legislation.

Mr. REED. If the Senator expects me to stand here and make any such admission as that——

Mr. CHILTON. Not now.

Mr. REED. He will have to use some acumen other than he even hinted at or suggested, because, with all respect to the Senator, who is as ingenious as any man I ever knew, I think his attempt to attack this section is the most hopeless failure it is ever possible for a smart man to make.

Mr. CHILTON. We are where we started, then. The Senate can well see that if the Senator and I had been on the conference committee, this Congress would adjourn by limitation before we would ever agree upon a bill, certainly upon section 25 as an original proposition, from my present sources of information.

But in the case of winding up a combination, under section 25, there is no provision for marshaling the assets of a corporation, and, in my judgment, it could not be done in a suit brought by the Government. The Government institutes a statutory proceeding for the purpose named in the statute. Section 4 of the Sherman law provides that the several courts of the United States are vested with jurisdiction "to prevent and restrain violation" of the act. It then provides "such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation may be enjoined or otherwise prohibited." In other words, the Sherman law provides that a proceeding shall be brought by petition, and the case of the Government shall be set forth in the petition, and that the prayer shall be that the violation shall be "enjoined or otherwise prohibited."

Neither in the Sherman law nor in section 25 of the Senate bill is there any provision for winding up the business of a corporation or a combination, and it may be seriously doubted whether or not a court of equity could, on a petition praying that the violation of the law should be prohibited, go forward and administer all of the assets of the various corporations which make up the combination. At most, it would be an unwieldy proceeding. But the substantial objection to it is the injustice which would be done to creditors and stockholders and others holding contractual relations with one of the corporations in any of the States. Take, for instance, the corporations in Missouri, 60 per cent of whose stock was purchased, in the supposed case.

Say that the Missouri corporation had real estate, leases, and various franchises. The trust owned 60 per cent of the stock and the stockholders of Missouri owned 40 per cent. The citizens of Missouri owning the 40 per cent did not vote to go into the trust and, in fact, took no part in any of the trust arrangements. The 60 per cent of the stock was grabbed by the holding company, and that controlled all the property, leases, and franchises in Missouri, but the Missouri corporation was preserved as a separate entity. Now, when the court shall wind up the combination, would it sell the 60 per cent of stock owned by the corporation or would it wind up each one of the individual corporations, stock in which was owned by the trust? Suppose it would sell only the 60 per cent of the stock held by the corporation, who would buy it? The owners of the 40 per cent of the stock in Missouri would be thus left at the mercy of many conditions which they could in no way control. Would the court winding up the corporation call in 60 per cent of the Missouri stockholders and leave the other 40 per cent out when it was entering a decree which so materially affected the interest of the 40 per cent? Then, what would become of the creditors of the corporation in Missouri? What would become of the contracts of the corporation? The argument which has been made that there are no innocent minority stockholders may be true in quite a number of cases, but it could not be true in all cases. The history of these transactions teaches that there are many cases where innocent holders of a minority of the stock could be materially injured by this kind of a law. It is clear that the statute is aimed at the assets, because the section in question required the court to retain jurisdiction over the assets for a sufficient time to satisfy the court that full and free competition is restored. Even if we considered only the disposition of the 60 per cent of the stock, would it be equitable and just for the court to reserve the final disposition of the 60 per cent of the stock for an indefinite time, regardless of the rights and the interest of the owners of the 40 per cent, and regardless of the rights and interests of the creditors? When we come to a consideration of the creditors, it may be that the corporation has bonds issued upon which interest is to be paid at certain stated times, and in case of failure to pay interest the whole principal sum secured by the mortgage shall become due. The hands of the 40 per cent of stockholders in Missouri would be tied. They would have no income out of which to pay the interest due at the required period, and it might so happen that while the court was dealing with the 60 per cent and with its receiver the interest would be defaulted and the whole principal sum due under the mortgage would be declared due and payable under its terms, and all of the property would be subject to sale, and the innocent holders of the 40 per cent of the stock would lose everything which they had in the corporation. It seems to me now, after hearing all the facts and all of the arguments against this section, that it would be unwise legislation.

The eminent lawyer who drew this section was no doubt inspired by the loftiest of purposes, but I fear that he did not have before him sufficient data upon which to frame legislation that would do complete justice to everyone who might be involved. In this, as in every other matter affecting these combinations, we are dealing with a condition and not a theory. Creditors and stockholders in the different States have rights. Liens created and contracts made in the different States should not be ruthlessly dealt with, and the courts should not be compelled to enter a decree in every case unless we can say that in every case the innocent will not be injured, and the remedy which we provide will always do exact justice. When we compel a court to do a specific thing, in every case we should be sure that there is the best of reason for it and that approximate justice will be the result. In view of the fact that there is a grave danger that innocent people may be injured and that there is really no way by which the court can in a practical way wind up these combinations by receivership in every case, the conferees felt that the section as drawn would be a grave mistake. But there was another reason urged against this section which deserves consideration, and that is the constitutional limitation as to the power of the Federal court to enact legislation. As I have said before, we can only deal with interstate commerce, and about all that has been settled on that line is that we may regulate what is interstate commerce, and in regulating it we may prohibit and enjoin certain combinations and organizations from engaging in it, and we may keep the channels of interstate commerce clear; that is, we can pass laws that will prevent any person or persons or combinations from clogging interstate commerce. We can regulate its instrumentalities and in that way exercise complete control over it. The great lawyers who prepared the Sherman antitrust law provided that the courts should prohibit these combinations and trusts. In other words, when the court finds that there is a monopoly or combination in restraint of trade it shall enjoin the things which violate the law. Now, suppose that a corporation of the State of West Virginia should become a part of a trust or combination in restraint of trade. The courts can undoubtedly enjoin it from engaging in interstate commerce, but can the courts confiscate its property? Can the courts confiscate its property as a punishment for crime after conviction by a jury?

If such a corporation of the State should be adjudged by a court to be a part of a combination in restraint of trade engaged in interstate commerce, could not the corporation say, "All right, I will pay the fine for this offense, and I will cease to engage in interstate commerce, and will retire to the State which created me, and will do business alone in that State, and will do only intrastate business; in other words, I will retire from the field of interstate commerce"? This would be legitimate and proper and clearly within its rights. The court has no power over any person or corporation except in so far as it may be necessary to exercise power to regulate interstate commerce. Section 25 of the Senate bill would prevent a corporation from taking this alternative. It is but just and fair that the Senate conferees offered to take this section 25 with an amendment making it optional with the court to appoint a receiver, but it could not keep the section in even with that offer. The Senate conferees obeyed the directions of the Senate in standing by the section until the time came when there could be no agreement with that section in the bill. They then yielded; and I have attempted to show the reasons why they did so, and I can not be frank with the Senate without saying that, in my judgment, the reasons were very strong, and if the matter were presented to me now I could not vote for the section in its present form. In my judgment it is impracticable; and if not impossible of enforcement, it would be so onerous and difficult of enforcement as to make it unwise.

Mr. President, this is a great constructive bill. Its purpose is to make certain things which have been uncertain. Its aim is to free business from suspicion and to allow every good man to go his way without fear and to make it possible for the Government to stop peremptorily any unfair methods which may lead to monopoly and restraint of trade. All of us should remember that the farmer, the workingman, the trader, and the professional man are stockholders, directors, and officers of thousands and thousands of corporations which are transacting business all over the United States.

It is not the purpose, and it ought not to be the purpose, of Congress to put these developers of the commerce of the country in perpetual fear. It ought not to be the law that when an active, energetic man in a community wants to be a director in a corporation he must go into the records of each corporation and analyze every possibility and probability of business and determine whether or not by accepting a responsibility or doing an ordinary act he will become a criminal. We must remember that 99 per cent of the transactions of this country are honest. The great majority of the people are honest. We want the people to engage in business. We want them to be enterprising and alert. It would be injurious to the business of this country to have it so that at every organization of a little corporation for the convenience of the people, and at every meeting of the board of directors of the apple companies, the orchard companies, the oil and gas companies, the stone companies, the coal companies, and the banks and other corporations, representing the activities of the people, it should be necessary to have an expert criminal lawyer always present. The fact is that when these little agencies of commerce are organized no one can tell where their activities and opportunities may lead them. They may become competitors of other corporations tomorrow when they are not to-day. We should encourage enterprise in the people and not stifle it. These two bills, when they become a law, together will make it so that the honest business man will not fear the blackmailer nor dread the unseen possibilities of a dragnet. He can go on, without fear, in any legitimate enterprise, and if others shall take his corporation into unfair practices the Trade Commission can regulate it, and he will have notice that what he had always understood to be a legitimate practice shall not be used as grounds for an indictment. I want to see business free from all unfair methods. I want to see the trusts and monopolies destroyed under the Sherman law. I want to see these unfair methods of competition stopped by the Federal Trade Commission. I want to see the banks made subservient to the people and instruments for their convenience under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board. That is the theory of these two bills.

I believe that this law will be the beginning of a better understanding between capital and labor, between the people and their Government, and that it will be the crowning act of that great constructive legislation which, beginning with the Interstate Commerce Commission, then followed by the Federal reserve act, and then by these two bills, will make a four-horse team that will put the power to compel a fair and just regulation of money, credits, transportation, and interstate business in the hands of the Government. It will then be up to the people to control their Government. The people can not control anything except through their Government. The mission of this administration is to put the Government into the hands of the people, and then give the Government power over these dangerous combinations, but do it in such a way as to assure, not to terrorize, legitimate business. I believe that they will take pride in doing so. These measures will free business from unlawful restraints and will start the people upon an era of prosperity which they have never known before.

It has been said that the President favors the adoption of the conference report. Knowing something of his good sense and of his practical way of meeting the duties which daily confront him, I would not be surprised that he is. He has not told me so, but, so far as I am concerned, nothing would give me more pleasure than to know that the humble part which I have taken in framing this legislation and on the conference committee has been crowned with a work which meets with the approval of the great Democratic leader, whose sound judgment in every crisis and whose poise in every national danger have attracted the admiration and compelled the respect of the entire people, not only of this country but wherever civilization exists.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if he desires to address himself to the pending question at some length?

Mr. NORRIS. I hardly know how long I shall speak, but I will say to the Senator that it will take me some time, and I am perfectly willing that the Senator from Illinois should proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska. I dare say the Senator from Nebraska desires to present such objections as are in his mind to the conference report. Is that the purpose of the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I am opposed to the conference report, but I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall now proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I did not assume to ask him what the line of his remarks was to be, but since the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], a member of the committee, has presented very fully his views, I take it that those on the other side of the question should be heard. I do not think, therefore, that I will intrude at this time, and I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, it having been understood that he was to speak, and a little later I will present myself for the recognition of the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I voted for this bill as it passed the Senate——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum. I do so with some hesitation, but the speeches this afternoon have been listened to for the most part by seven or eight Senators, and a discussion carried on under such circumstances is utterly useless. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Lane	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Bryan	Lewis	Perkins	Smoot
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Pomerene	Sterling
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Reed	Swanson
Culberson	Myers	Robinson	Thomas
Fletcher	Norris	Saulsbury	Thompson
Kern	O'Gorman	Sheppard	Thornton

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, Mr. PAGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SHIVELY, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia responded to their names when called.

Mr. JONES, Mr. DU PONT, Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. STONE, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. WEEKS, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. McCUMBER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHILTON. I have received a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the oil and gas producers of St. Marys, W. Va., relative to the proposed tax on gasoline. I ask that the telegram be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

ST. MARYS, W. VA., September 30, 1914.

Senator CHILTON, Washington, D. C.:

Oil and gas producers of this district call attention to the fact that the revenue bill as it now stands is unjust in that it does not tax imported gasoline or gasoline in storage. Besides, is so excessive that its passage means a closing down of almost the entire casing-head gasoline industry.

J. D. DINSMOOR.
O. C. SWEENY.
W. C. DOTSON.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of sundry national banks and trust companies in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Taunton, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide that goods covered by foreign patents taken out in this country shall be manufactured here, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Court of Common Council of Hartford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide pensions for civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented memorials of the Real Estate Board of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed tax on real-estate conveyances, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed revenue tax on cigars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of the Michigan Bankers' Association, the Clearing House Committee of Detroit, and the National Bank of Commerce of Detroit, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OWEN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oklahoma, remonstrating against the imposition of an emergency tax on miscellaneous products, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oklahoma City, Tulsa, Durant, Muskogee, and Ardmore, all in the State of Oklahoma, remonstrating against the proposed tax on gasoline, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry bankers of Hartshorne, Pawnee, Marietta, Fort Towson, Woodville, Mangum, Amorita, Eakly, Tribbey, Claremore, Calera, Cushing, and Cherokee, all in the State of Oklahoma, remonstrating against the proposed tax on capital and surplus of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON EDUCATION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education, and I submit a report (No. 800) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be reported.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to invite foreign Governments to appoint honorary vice presidents and otherwise participate in the International Congress on Education, to be held at Oakland, Cal., August 16 to 27, 1915, in connection with the Panama-Pacific International Exposition: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time hereafter in connection with said congress.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I desire to say that there is no expense attached to the Government in connection with the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to state for the record that if I am here and an appropriation is ever asked for this purpose I shall oppose it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE RECLAMATION SERVICE.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 172) excepting the Reclamation Service from the operations of section 5 of the act of Congress approved July 16, 1914, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 799) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WEEKS (for Mr. SHERMAN):

A bill (S. 6557) granting a pension to Sarah J. Crackel; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 6558) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca L. Lapaugh (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 1, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in Heaven, we bless Thee for that sublime optimism, born of faith in Thee and in humanity, which confidently looks forward to the triumph of right and truth and justice, and we most fervently pray that we may work together with Thee to that end, under the spiritual leadership of Thy son Jesus Christ. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GORDON. On the last day this House was in session having under consideration the Philippine bill this colloquy occurred——

Mr. MANN. What day?

Mr. GORDON. Page 15849.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ansberry	Browning	Connolly, Iowa	Elder
Austin	Bryan	Conry	Falson
Barchfeld	Burke, Pa.	Copley	Falconer
Barkley	Burke, Wis.	Curry	Ferris

A number of Members having appeared at the bar to have their names recorded,

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will see if the gentleman from Oklahoma is recorded.

Mr. CARTER. Am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will record the gentleman's name.

Mr. WHITACRE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will record the name of the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair will state that this overflow, as it may be called, on roll calls is getting to be almost equivalent to a third roll call, and the Chair advises all Members to examine the rule book carefully to see if they have the right to answer at all under such circumstances.

Mr. CARTER. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I answered to my name, but I was not sure that it had been recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands. His remark has nothing more to do with the gentleman than with any other Member of the House. It is a waste of time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the announcement, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 306 Members have answered to their names.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] is recognized.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday, the last day on which the Philippine bill was under consideration, the following colloquy occurred on the floor of this House:

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I think I will have to yield.

Mr. GORDON. I simply want to ask you if you are sure about your figures when you say that 85 per cent of those people are unable to read or write?

Mr. FESS. I take that from the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who, when asked about it, confirms the statement.

Mr. GORDON. I will say to you that you are mistaken. The literacy in the Philippines is higher than it is in any country south of the United States.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FESS. My colleague is capable of any sort of a statement, without regard to whether it is true or not, and therefore I shall not enter into a controversy longer with him. I can not allow anybody to interrupt me who has absolutely no regard for what he says. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to engage in competition with the gentleman from Ohio in the use of billingsgate or in the bandying of epithets, but I simply desire to state to this House that I was constrained to interrupt the gentleman upon the highest possible ground of public policy.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman desires some time and will give this side time, I shall have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for five minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has stated a question of personal privilege. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has practically stated that what the gentleman stated is untrue, and that is a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The only reason the Chair stated that the gentleman asked five minutes was to expedite matters. The Chair thinks, as he decided upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois on December 12, 1912, that it is a question of privilege.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not decide, of course, as to this particular language. It is only a question of whether it reflects upon a Member in his representative capacity.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the point of order. The point of order is whether words spoken in debate and not taken down give rise to a question of personal privilege hereafter. If the Speaker holds that they do——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois and myself both know, and so do a good many others, that there are many Members of the House who never investigate the rule about taking down words and do not know anything about it, and they lose their opportunity that would come up under that rule. The Chair is not passing upon this language in this particular case in what he is going to say in a general way, but the practice by which one Member can stand up here and vilify another about what he is saying in his representative capacity, and because he does not understand that rule about taking down words the complaining Member loses his opportunity to have the matter corrected——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, to save time I will ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORDON. As is well known to the membership of this House, there have been several questions of fact raised here between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and myself. We are not upon especially friendly terms, and I was extremely reluctant to interrupt him the other day, and would not have done so except with his consent and upon what I deemed to be the highest reasons of public policy. He had stated that 85 per cent of the people of the Philippine Islands are illiterate. I called his attention to the statement. I had not at hand the figures and data to refute it at that time, but I have since looked into the question, and find that a census taken by the Government of the United States in 1903 reported that only 55.5 per cent of the people of those islands were then illiterate, and since that time, as has been stated in speeches which we have heard on the Republican side, a "campaign of education" has been going on over there, so that we have a right to assume that the people have not declined in literacy to the extent of 30 per cent as a result of that campaign of education. We have had several insurrections over there, and when members of the Committee on Insular Affairs, availing themselves of the privileges of the floor of this House, see fit to make erroneous statements concerning those people upon a question like their literacy or illiteracy, upon which any people are extremely sensitive, it seems to me it imposes a grave duty upon the House itself and every Member in it to call attention to the misstatement, whether it is made intentionally or not. That was the sole purpose for which I rose, and I do not care to carry on this discussion. I think I can place my reputation for veracity, standing, or character alongside that of any other Member of this House among the people who know me. [Applause.]

Time at last sets all things even. Justice travels with a leaden heel, but strikes with an iron hand.

I thank the House for its courtesy. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the announcement that my colleague [Mr. GORDON] made a moment ago—that we were not on the most friendly terms—is a surprise to me, for I had no intimation that that was true. I did not know that there was anything at all between Mr. GORDON and myself. That may seem strange to some people, but I am not responsible for the gentleman's feeling on that matter. In the second place, if the Speaker referred to me in his statement to the House that if anyone thought he could get up here and vilify a Member, and allow it to pass, when the Member might not know his recourse by having the words taken down, I want to apologize to the Speaker and to the House if any words from my lips appeared to be in the form of vilification, for I did not mean them in that way; and to my friend [Mr. GORDON] I want to say publicly that I have absolutely no ill feeling toward him, and if it shall appear that I have wronged him, I will be glad to make a public apology and ask that the words be taken from the RECORD, for I have no intention of doing anything of the sort. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Speaker stated positively and plainly that the remark he made did not apply to this particular case, and was not intended to, but laid down a general proposition in answer to a point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the altercation of the other day, which has been brought to the attention of the House this morning, started possibly from the speech which I had made a few hours previously, and inasmuch as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON], with commendable industry, has been searching the records to endeavor to find facts to establish what he then said, and has made a statement with regard to literacy in the Philippine Islands, it may be proper that I say a word respecting literacy in the islands. In the first place, the statement which was quoted by the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. SHERWOOD. Which one?

Mr. MILLER. The statement of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FESS, in reference to literacy, he inadvertently doubtless made because he understood me to say that 85 per cent of the inhabitants of the islands were illiterate. The figures which I gave at that time were in respect to the proportion of the Philippine people who were acquainted with and had a proper appreciation and knowledge of the meaning of independence, or the institution of independence, the 15 per cent being the class who did and the 85 per cent being the class who did not. But even at that, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from Ohio is perhaps well within the facts, as they are pertinent to the discussion which we had at that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Which gentleman?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. FESS. It is not true that 85 per cent of the population of the Philippine Islands to-day are illiterate. Why? Because beneath the Stars and Stripes the American schoolhouse has been there for 14 years. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.] Wait a moment. Talk all you please when I have finished.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. MILLER. The children of the islands are literate, as far as their schools have been able to furnish them facilities.

Mr. BURNETT. What did Mr. FESS say that for then? Did he not intend to tell the truth?

Mr. MILLER. Never mind. I can not yield. I have but three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MILLER. But if it be said in respect to the adult people, those who are charged with public affairs to-day and with the administering of any political institutions that might be established by reason of independence, including both civilized and uncivilized peoples, it is probably entirely and absolutely correct. [Applause on the Republican side.] There are regions where a very much larger per cent are literate; then there are regions where practically the total population are illiterate.

One word further. There are certain qualifications the possession of any one of which enables a man in the Philippine Islands to vote to-day. One is property and one is education—the capacity to read or write Spanish or English. If a man has any literacy at all, he should be able to read or write Spanish or English. But even under those liberal terms, in the election of 1912, their last election, there were but a little over 240,000 voters out of a population of more than 8,000,000 people, and of those 240,000 more than 70 per cent were absolutely illiterate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a Senate bill on the Speaker's table, an innocent little uncontested bridge bill, be taken up for immediate consideration, there being an identical House bill on the calendar.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman delay that just a moment to allow me to make a request?

Mr. ADAMSON. I certainly will, for the purpose indicated.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think I will ask for the regular order.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Under the rule the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, before yielding to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON], I wish to consume about two minutes in making a statement. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who has just addressed the House, has undertaken to justify a statement which he made on Monday last as to the extent of illiteracy in the Philippine Islands. I hold in my hand the fourteenth special report of the director of education of the Philippine Islands, which has just been received but which has not as yet been printed. In this report the director of education states that in the year 1866 there were 1,674 schools reported, with an attendance of 135,000 boys and 12,260 girls; in all, 147,260 Filipinos in the schools in 1866. In the year 1892 the number of schools had increased from 1,674 to 2,173.

I also have before me a book written by the confidential secretary of Mr. Dean C. Worcester, who was until recently the commissioner of the interior of the Philippine Islands. Another and larger edition of this book has recently been published, the introduction to which was written by former President Taft, who testifies to the accuracy of statement of the author. This book was written in 1905, and its author makes this statement in it:

> One may fairly say that approximately one-half the Christian population over 10 years of age is literate. But this includes the people of the most backward and outlying Christian settlements, in the mountains of north-central Luzon, in unsettled islands like Mindoro and Palawan, and on the outskirts of Mindanao.

That was nine years ago. Since that time there has been on an average 600,000 children in the Philippine schools, and I am absolutely justified in saying, and the statement will be supported by those familiar with the facts, that 75 per cent of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands to-day over 10 years of age in the Christian Provinces are literate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. To a question.

Mr. TOWNER. I understood the gentleman to say that in 1866 there were 147,000 children in the public schools.

Mr. JONES. Public and private.

Mr. TOWNER. How many in the public schools and how many in the private?

Mr. JONES. A large majority of them in the public schools. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands [Mr. QUEZON].

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, the bill we are now discussing is of momentous importance to 10,000,000 people on the other side of the Pacific Ocean; it affects their life, their property, their welfare, and, what is more vital than all else, their liberty. The action of the Congress upon this bill will determine whether the long struggle for freedom, wherein those people have been engaged with untold sacrifice in life and wealth, will be crowned with success or doomed to disheartening failure

The bill is also important to 100,000,000 people on this side of the Pacific; it puts to a test the foundations of their national life and it affects their national duty as much as their national honor.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE BILL.

Let no man upon this floor have any doubts regarding the nature of the question upon which he is to vote. In its last analysis that question is simply this: Will you, as a Christian and powerful Nation, do to another Christian but weak nation what the Golden Rule commands you to do? Will you, as the offspring of those who pledged their lives, their property, and their sacred honor to the enforcement of the principle that all men are born free and are entitled to their freedom, and that just governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed, be true to the covenant of your fathers? Nay, the question involves more than the observance or disregard of a duty imposed by general or, as some may cynically say, outworn principles. The question is whether you are ready to redeem or would prefer to repudiate concrete and recent promises, both expressed and implied, made in the name of your faithful and honorable Nation to the people of the Philippine Islands, that the dawn of a glorious day shall come when full justice will be done them and when every opportunity shall be given for self-development and progress under the auspices of their own free and independent flag. [Applause.]

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. Chairman, the Philippines are an archipelago lying between latitudes 21° and 40° north and between meridians 116° and 127° east longitude. On these islands nature has bestowed with generous hand and in harmonious combination her riches and her beauties. Millions of acres of agricultural land capable of growing all kinds of tropical products; forests with excellent woods in large quantity and variety; mines of gold and silver and rich deposits of lead, iron, and petroleum; glorious sunsets, moonlight and stormy nights, cascades, lakes, valleys, rivers, mountains, volcanoes, enchanting inland seas, and beautiful panoramas make this land the "Pearl of the Orient."

This is the country which in the daybreak of a beautiful May morning of 1898 witnessed the majestic entrance into Manila Bay of a powerful fleet bearing the death sentence of Spanish sovereignty in the Philippine Islands.

THE FILIPINO PEOPLE.

This country was then, as it is now, the dwelling, the home, of a people homogeneous in race, one in religion—with the exception of a proportionately small number of uncivilized non-Christians—welded together into a common nationality and united in a single overmastering ambition—to be free and independent.

These people had then been, for three long centuries, subject to the civilizing and ennobling influence of the doctrines of the Saviour, which they had espoused and which taught them the equality and the dignity of men. Science, arts, and letters were then familiar subjects among the leaders of that people, as public instruction was already within reach of the masses, a large percentage of whom were literate before American occupation. Social life among the wealthy and highly educated class was similar to that of the corresponding class in western Europe, except that there were never aristocratic tendencies among the wealthy and educated Filipinos. An ideal home with mutual devotion between husband and wife and between parents and children constituted the solid foundation of this growing nationality. The hospitality and sobriety of these people were then, as they are now, among their most conspicuous characteristics, just as their thirst for education and love for freedom were and are their greatest national virtues.

Such are the people who a decade and a half ago fell under the sovereignty of the United States, and in whose interest the Congress is now called upon to legislate.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS DURING THE SPANISH RÉGIME.

Mr. Chairman, I am so pressed for time that I should have stopped with the foregoing general description of the Filipino people were it not for certain statements made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] that require to be answered with concrete data. The gentleman from Minnesota in the course of his speech said that—

When the American flag was first unfurled in that part of the globe there was no adequate system of public instruction. There was a "paper system"— promulgated by the Spanish Government, which was never put into effect.

He said—

Then he proceeds:

If you could read the beautiful reports which the Governor General sent back to the Cortes of Spain, you would find many glowing accounts of the schools and the teachers and the pupils, but the teachers and the schools and the pupils had little physical existence outside of the imagination of the man who penned the lines. There were some schools back a little earlier than 1898. They were church schools; there were no public schools, however, under the supervision of the Government excepting a limited few.

Mr. Chairman, at the time these remarks were made by the gentleman from Minnesota he was kind enough to allow me to make the statement that there were public schools in the Philippines long before American occupation, and that, in fact, I was myself educated in one of those schools, although my native town is a very small village isolated in the mountains of the northeastern part of the island of Luzon. What I then said I now reiterate.

That the system of public instruction established by the Spanish Government was far less efficient than the system established by the United States is, of course, unqualifiedly true; but that such a system was to be found only on "paper," and that the teachers and the schools and the pupils had little actual existence outside of the "imagination" of the man who wrote that paper is very wide of the mark.

Why, Mr. Chairman, as early as the year 1866, when the total population of the Philippine Islands was only 4,411,261, and when the total number of municipalities in the archipelago was 900, the number of public schools was 841 for boys and 833 for girls, and the number of boys attending these schools was 135,098 and of girls 95,260; and these schools were real buildings, and the pupils alert, intelligent, living human beings. In 1892 the number of schools had increased to 2,137, of which 1,087 were for boys and 1,050 for girls. I have seen with my own eyes many of these schools and thousands of these pupils. They were not "church schools," but schools created, supported, and maintained by the Government.

How real these schools were can be gathered from the paragraph that I shall directly read from the Philippine census—an American-made document. It should be noted that to a certain extent the census shares the pessimistic views of the gentleman from Minnesota regarding said schools, yet it admits that the schools were something more substantial than the creatures of a prolific imagination. After giving the number of schools and pupils as I stated them and depicting the deficiencies of that system of education, the census makes this remarkable admission:

Popular instruction attained a more than average advance, evidently due to the natural talent, the virtue of the race, and its precocity and willingness to be educated, all of which were characteristic and common qualities of young Filipinos.

How could any advance in popular instruction have been possible if the schools and the pupils did not exist in reality and in the flesh?

LITERACY PRIOR TO AMERICAN OCCUPATION.

There is still another evidence of the existence of old schools and of the pupils I have described. According to this same census, those who could neither read nor write when you arrived at Manila were only 55.5 per cent of the population 10 years of age and over. How did the remaining 44.5 become literate? By intuition perhaps? [Laughter.]

I am inclined to believe, Mr. Chairman, that the utterances of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] upon which I have commented were more or less rhetorical figures of speech. The gentleman's gift as a born orator will not permit him to adhere merely to bare, cold facts. He doubtless meant only to convey to the committee a graphic idea of the unsatisfactoriness of the Spanish system of education and of the poor quality of the schools as compared with the system and the schools we now have. If so, the gentleman from Minnesota has more than a mere excuse for his statement; he has a justification in fact. [Laughter and applause.]

But while I could thus explain the seeming inaccuracy of the gentleman from Minnesota, I am at a loss to understand, Mr. Chairman, how it was possible for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], a distinguished and learned professor as he is, to make upon this floor the amazing remark that to-day 85 per cent of the population of the Philippines can neither read nor write.

It will be noticed that the figures of the census I have already cited regarding persons who could neither read nor write were 55.5 per cent, or 30 per cent lower than the figures given by the gentleman from Ohio; and, further, that those figures of the census represented the degree of literacy prior to 1903, while the figures of the gentleman from Ohio refer to the supposed illiteracy in this year of grace 1914. Is it possible that illiteracy in the Philippines was lower before American schools were established there? Have we, then, retrograded? Can these American schools have served to render the Filipino people more illiterate than before? What a humiliating tale would that be for the American government in the islands, whose beneficial and uplifting influence has been so enthusiastically described by the gentleman from Ohio himself. Fortunately for you and for us, Mr. Chairman, and for the common glory of both your teachers and our youth, such is not the case, for instead of going backward we have, as everybody knows, gone onward by leaps and bounds. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

PRIVATE SCHOOLS, COLLEGES, AND UNIVERSITY UNDER SPAIN.

Mr. Chairman, returning to the condition of education during Spanish régime, I have shown convincingly to the most skeptical, I think, that there were public schools in the Philippines, though not half as good or as numerous as the schools of to-day, half a century before American occupation, and that those schools were not private or church schools, as the gentleman from Minnesota would have us believe. It is absolutely true, however, that besides these public schools there were also private schools, as there were colleges and one university where professional training was given. Some of these institutions preceded for many hundred years the establishment of Government schools. Founded and supported by private funds, these institutions were to be found not only in Manila but in the Provinces as well. The more important of the colleges were Santo Tomás, San Juan de Letrán, Ateneo Municipal, Escuela Normal, San José, Escuela Náutica National, Escuela de Contaduría, Academia de Pintura y Dibujo, and the seminaries in Manila, Nueva Segovia, Cebu, Jaro, and Nueva Caceres. The college of Santo Tomás, founded in 1519, was converted into the university of the same name in 1645, since which date this institution of learning has given to the scientific world distinguished men in almost every branch of science. Bishops, members of the Spanish Parliament, high officers in the Spanish Army, priests, judges, doctors in philosophy, in medicine, and in laws are to be found in the long list of distinguished pupils of this ancient alma mater of the Filipino youth. Living witnesses to-day of the efficiency of these colleges, seminaries, and this university are the three Filipino members of the insular supreme court, among them the chief justice, who was honored by the University of Yale with the degree of doctor of laws, the Filipino members of the Philippine Commission, the two Filipino bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, the speaker and members of the Philippine Assembly, the attorney general, the Filipino judges of the courts of first instance, the provincial fiscals (prosecuting attorneys), the provincial governors, some of the Filipino treasurers, and some of the professors in the government university—in a word, almost every one of the Filipino officials occupying responsible and important positions now, since they were all educated at those centers, the youth educated in American schools not having as yet attained the maturity to occupy such positions.

AMERICAN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Mr. Chairman, enough of this history. Let me now come down to the education of the day. I need not, I am sure, long detain the committee on this subject, for there are few things among those accomplished in the Philippines during your time that have been so widely published as the work done in education. It may not be amiss, however, to indicate that the average enrollment for the last 10 years of our public schools has been half a million, and that the number of public schools, according to the latest report of the director of education, is 4,304. How much these schools have accomplished can be gathered from the following statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs in his report to the Secretary of War of March, 1913: "At least 3,000,000 children have been instructed in English," said Gen. McIntyre.

There is a further evidence of the achievement of these schools. When they were first established in the islands, in view of the fact that all the instruction had to be given in English, and that there were scarcely any Filipinos who knew this language, few, if any, Filipinos were appointed teachers. To-day, of the total of 9,483 teachers teaching English 8,825 are Filipinos. I shall pause here, Mr. Chairman, long enough to compare the statement made by the gentleman from Minnesota as to the capacity of the Filipino teacher to take charge of a school independent of any American supervision with that recently made by the director of education.

Let me read what the gentleman from Minnesota said in his speech:

I also wanted to see what was the result to the school of removing American supervision. So I traveled and I saw. I found that wherever American supervision was immediate, was direct, was there on the ground, the work of the teacher and the children and the school was efficient. It was what you might call satisfactory. The spirit was good. The morale was good. Things were shipshape. The atmosphere was such as you would like to see in a school. But, without a single exception, when you removed that immediate supervision and allowed a school in charge of a Filipino teacher to be removed and separated and to exist by itself the decline was immediate and most disheartening.

Oh, I visited so many of the schools that if they had not been named "schools" I would never have known that they were schools, because the supervision was not there, eloquently testifying to the capacity of the Filipino teachers to respond to the ideas that they see and to the utmost importance of the supervision and direction on the part of the American supervising force. This does not mean the Filipino teacher never can be self-reliant; it simply means that, while advancing, he has not yet reached it.

Contrast with this the words of the director of education in his special report of January 23, 1914:

It has been the policy of the bureau of education to lay an increasing amount of responsibility upon the Filipino teacher. As a result, where five years ago there were 70 Filipino and 390 American supervising teachers, there are to-day 124 Filipino supervising teachers and 185 American. Moreover, there are a number of Filipinos assigned to work which is at least equal in importance and responsibility to that of the supervising teachers. There are now 29 Filipino provincial industrial supervisors, and this number will be constantly increased. There are at present 120 intermediate schools with Filipino principals. Five years ago there were 208 Filipino and 366 American teachers engaged in intermediate instruction. At the present time there are 430 Filipinos and 148 Americans. Primary instruction, except in a very few classes where special work is being carried on, is entirely in the hands of Filipinos.

It would not be far from the truth to state that the school system as it existed seven years ago, with the exception of certain administrative officers, has been almost completely Filipinized.

Evidently the director of education would not have increased and would not contemplate a further increase in the number of Filipino supervisors if such a policy resulted in defective service. And it is also evident that the opinion of the director of education is more authoritative in this case than that of the gentleman from Minnesota, for the director of education has had more time and opportunity to know the facts, while it has been his daily business to acquaint himself with the work of the Filipino teachers.

HIGHER INSTRUCTION OF TO-DAY.

Keeping pace with the marvelous progress in the number and quality of our public schools since American occupation, private schools and colleges have also increased numerically, so that to-day not only the old private schools and the institutions of higher instruction are in existence in the Philippine Islands, but thousands upon thousands of new private schools and scores of colleges for girls and boys and one more university sustained by the government, every one filled almost to its full capacity with students, are to-day being carried on.

Before passing to another subject it is interesting to notice that the most striking feature of Filipino life to-day is the ardent desire for education. I shall quote, because it expresses the consensus of opinion on the subject in the most concrete and beautiful way, a few paragraphs of a speech made by Col. Harbord before the Lake Mohonk conference in 1909. Col. Harbord, who has been for over 10 years a colonel of constabulary stationed in the Philippines, said:

No sojourner in the Philippines can fail to notice the intense desire of all classes of the people for education. It is the wish of which he will be most constantly reminded. Servants, coachmen, laborers, hundreds of them, carry little phrase books of short-language methods and are earnestly striving to learn English. * * * Public money for education is one appropriation never criticized by the vernacular press of Manila. Night and day schools are well attended, and in some of the former local officials, overcoming their fear of ridicule and swallowing their pride, have sat beside their own children as pupils learning English. * * * Certainly the desire for education is one of the moving motives of Filipino life to-day. Parents make the most complete sacrifices to send their children to school, and the pupils themselves endure hunger and privation to secure learning.

PRESENT LITERACY ESTIMATED.

In view of what has been said, Mr. Chairman, I think I can safely predict, without being overoptimistic, that if a new census were to be taken to-day among the Christian population the degree of illiteracy will be found to have fallen to 15 or 20 per cent; or, in other words, the 85 per cent mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio will not represent those who can neither read nor write, but those who can both read and write.

FILIPINO APPRECIATION OF THE BENEFITS OF THE AMERICAN RÉGIME.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up more time of the committee in discussing the merits of the school system established in the islands by the United States. The rapidity with which the English language has spread throughout the archipelago and the readiness with which Filipinos have become both able to use that language and able also to teach it stand as an eloquent testimonial not only to the intellectual capacity of the Filipino people but also to the efficiency of that system, as well as to the ability and devotion to duty of American teachers, both men and women, who have done so much and so well by the Filipino youth. God bless them. We shall never be able to repay their labors. An elaborate discussion of that system has been offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], and, with the exception of the statement regarding the Filipino supervising teachers to which I have already referred, I can indorse what he said.

What I do wish to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, because of an incident which occurred the other day, when I and my people came near being accused of being inappreciative of the benefits we had received from the American Government in the islands, is that there is a well-nigh universal appreciation on our part of the services you have rendered to our country. And to convince you that this is not a tardy or a forced confession, I have only to refer to my maiden speech, delivered upon this floor on May 14, 1910, wherein I said:

To those distant islands, Mr. Chairman, I beg to direct the attention of the House, and in so doing I am glad to be able to affirm, first of all, that simultaneously with the American occupation there has been established a more liberal government, and from that day the Filipinos have enjoyed more personal and political liberty than they ever did under the Spanish Crown. [Applause.] These facts are freely acknowledged throughout the length and breadth of the islands, and my countrymen wish me most cordially to assure the House, and through it the people of the United States, that they are grateful, profoundly grateful, for all the benefits that your Government has conferred upon them.

The Philippine Assembly, the body vested with full authority to speak for the people of the islands, has on every occasion when a great concession has been made by this Government to the Filipino people invariably spoken words of deep-felt gratitude.

It is recorded in the archives of this Government that the first action adopted by the Philippine Assembly created by a Republican Congress, upon its inauguration, was unanimously to pass on October 19, 1907, the following resolution:

Be it resolved by the Philippine Commission and the Philippine Assembly, That on their own behalf and on behalf of the people of the Philippine Islands they convey, and they do hereby convey, to the President of the United States, and through him to the Congress and the people of the United States, their profound sentiment of gratitude and high appreciation of the signal concession made to the people of the islands of participating directly in the making of the laws which shall govern them.

The first act of the Philippine Assembly after Gov. Gen. Harrison delivered to the Filipino people the message of President Wilson reaffirming the statement that the policy of this Government is to grant the Filipinos their independence as soon as the safety and permanent interests of the islands will permit, and promising the appointment of a majority of Filipinos in the upper house of our legislature, was to adopt the following address:

We, the representatives of the Filipino people constituting the Philippine Assembly, solemnly declare that it is evident to us that the Filipino people have the right to be free and independent, so that in advancing alone along the road of progress it will on its own responsibility work out its prosperity and manage its own destinies for all the purposes of life. This was the aspiration of the people when it took up arms against Spain, and the presence of the American flag, first on Manila Bay and then in the interior of the archipelago, did not modify but rather encouraged and strengthened the aspiration, despite all the reverses suffered in war and difficulties encountered in peace. Being called to the ballot box the people again and again ratified this aspiration, and since the inauguration of the Philippine Assembly the national representative body has been acting in accordance with the popular will only; thus, in the midst of the most adverse circumstances, the ideal of the people never wavered and was respectfully and frankly brought before the powers of the sovereign country on every propitious occasion. On the other hand, our faith in the justice of the American people was as great and persistent as our ideal. We have waited in patience, confident that sooner or later all errors and injustices would be redressed. The message of the President of the United States to the Filipino people is eloquent proof that we have not waited in vain. We accept said message with love and gratitude, and consider it a categorical declaration of the purpose of the Nation to recognize the independence of the islands. The immediate step of granting us a majority on the commission places in our hands the instruments of power and responsibility for the establishment by ourselves of a stable Filipino Government. We fully appreciate and are deeply grateful for the confidence reposed in us by the Government of the United States. We look upon the appointment of the Hon. Francis Burton Harrison as Governor General as the unmistakable harbinger of the new era in which we expect the attitude of the people to be one of cooperation, and, finally, we believe happily the experiments of imperialism have come to an end and that colonial exploitation has passed into history. The epoch of mistrust has been closed and the Filipinos, upon having thrown open to them the doors of opportunity, are required to assume the burden of responsibility which it would be inexcusable cowardice on their part to avoid or decline. Owing to this, a few days have sufficed to bring about a good understanding between Americans and Filipinos, which it had been impossible to establish during the 13 years past. We are convinced that every onward step, while relieving the American Government of its responsibilities in the islands, will, as in the past, fully demonstrate the present capacity of the Filipino people to establish a government of its own and guarantee in a permanent manner the safety under such government of the life, property, and liberty of the residents of the islands, national as well as foreign. We do not wish to say by this that there will be no difficulties and embarrassments nor do we even expect that the campaign opened or concealed of the Filipino cause will cease soon, but we feel sure that through a conservative use of the powers intrusted to us the Filipino people will, with God's favor and the help of America, emerge triumphantly from the test, however difficult it may be.

The first act of the Philippine Legislature after the majority of the appointive commission had been made to consist of Filipinos was to pass, at a joint session of the legislature, wherein no American member was present, a resolution which reads as follows:

Whereas upon his arrival on these shores, on the 6th day of October, 1913, the Hon. Francis Burton Harrison, Governor General of the Philippine Islands, was the bearer of an expressive message from the President of the United States, Hon. Woodrow Wilson, to the people of these islands, assuring that as a first step in the new policy said people would be given a majority on the legislative commission; and

Whereas a few days thereafter the said President sent to the Senate of the United States the nominations of four new Filipino members of the commission, retaining, besides, one of the Filipino members in office, so that the majority announced would become effective upon confirmation of the nominations of the new members by said Senate; and

Whereas on October 27, 1913, the august body last mentioned confirmed the nominations of Victorino Mapa, Jayme C. de Veyra, Vicente Ilustre, and Vicente Singson Encarnacion, who, with Rafael Palma, constitute the promised majority of Filipino members on the commission; and

Whereas on this 30th day of October, 1913, when the new members of the Philippine Commission took the oath of office, a decisive step was taken under the present administration toward self-government, and the Filipino people were granted an ostensible power, tending to make it directly responsible for its own destiny: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Philippine Commission and the Philippine Assembly, convened in joint session in the marble hall of the Ayuntamiento, That they express, and hereby do express, their deepest gratitude toward the President and Government of the United States for granting the people of the Philippine Islands a majority on the commission as soon as circumstances permitted, the announcement of the promises being thus followed by immediate action; and the Filipino people, upon assuming on this day its new responsibility, hopes to be able to justify by acts the confidence reposed in it, managing the public affairs through the new legislature in such manner that the results shall be conducive to the maintenance of law and order, the progress and the improvement of the general conditions of these islands, and the safeguarding of all legitimately established interests in the same, be they foreign or native; and be it

Resolved further, That the Chief Executive of the Philippine Islands be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit the text of this resolution by cable to the President of the United States.

Adopted, October 30, 1913.

ARE THE FILIPINOS UNGRATEFUL?

Yet, and in spite of these public acknowledgments, we are misunderstood, we are called ungrateful when we take exception to the idea so earnestly advanced by many that since you have established splendid schools, fine roads, up-to-date sanitation, and a more liberal government than Spain ever did, the United States should not only keep her flag floating for an indefinite period of time, or forever, over the Philippines, but should also retain and continue to exercise direct, absolute, and complete control of our domestic affairs. And when we dare to say—even though only when actually forced to speak our mind—that we believe we can make progress and develop hereafter without American sovereignty, and that perhaps we should have done as well as we have thus far done under the control of the United States had we been left alone after we had established our short-lived Philippine Republic, our words provoke stormy protests.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with this I am constrained specifically to call the attention of the committee to a remark made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] on September 28, the last day that this bill was up, because I wish to put myself correctly on record.

The gentleman from Ohio said:

This is what I wanted to say before I sat down. The Filipino problem is one of education. I am somewhat disturbed at the statements of the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines. He is the only representative of these people now upon the floor, as he remarked to-day. I put the question straight to him, "Do you think that without American occupation the Philippines would be as well off now as they are?" He first did not answer. I pressed it, and then he said, "I do," and gave his reasons. And the membership on the Democratic side of the House applauded that statement, meaning that they believe that the American occupation, with all the loss of treasure and blood and sacrifice, has been useless. Is it possible? Can such an utterance meet with approval on either side of the aisle?

Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry to have uttered anything that could disturb the gentleman from Ohio. Let it be noted, however, that he had placed me in a position which allowed me no option but to say what I did say. The gentleman's own presentation of the incident proves it. "I put the question straight to him," the gentleman says, "Do you think that without American occupation the Philippines would be as well off now as they are?" Then he adds, and I beg the committee to listen to these words attentively: "He first did not answer. I pressed it, and then he said, 'I do,' and gave his reason."

Mr. Chairman, the learned professor from Ohio [Mr. FESS] knows as well as I do that it is at times the part of wisdom to keep silent on certain questions, but when a man must open his mouth it is his duty to himself and to others to say precisely what he thinks. Come what may, we are bound to tell the truth, or what we believe to be the truth. I did not first answer the question of the gentleman because I thought it wiser to keep my own counsel on that subject; but he insisted upon an answer, he pressed me, as he himself has said, when he might have been gracious enough to save me from the embarrassment of saying something against my will, and so to spare himself the displeasure of hearing it. The result was what any sympathetic man must have expected.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, much as I regret it, I can not yield, for I have not the time. I do not wish to be discourteous——

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman decline to yield when he refers to what I said?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will understand my position. I can hardly go into a personal controversy with Members of the House during the debate on this bill, for I do not feel as free to express myself as they do. My position is different from that of any other Member, since I am acting here as an advocate while they both advocate their own views and act as judges as well. And how unwise and inadvisable it is for an advocate to quarrel with another advocate who is also the jury and the bench. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the gentleman is so desirous to discuss the Philippine question with me, he will find me ready to meet him either in a private debate between ourselves or in public.

But I must decline, Mr. Chairman, to engage in personal arguments on this floor while this bill is under your consideration, because I might antagonize not only him with whom I am arguing, but by reason of the esprit du corps which exists in every organization I may also antagonize everyone else. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. If I must, I will.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman mean that the gentleman can talk to me privately about a matter of which he could not speak here?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may be able to make myself understood by the gentleman from Ohio. No; I do not mean that. I mean that I do not propose to be dragged into a personal controversy on this floor while this bill is pending, unless, after these protestations, I am still forced into it. Now, if the gentleman insists, he is welcome to put any question or present any argument he may wish.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the gentleman—now after Monday when the question was put to the gentleman and he answered that a little reluctantly, and it is now several days since that occurred—does the gentleman think that the Philippine situation would be in as good a shape if the American occupation had not been there up to this time?

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio desires a fair answer to his question, I shall have to give him more time so that he may explain to me exactly what he means. If he means to ask whether the Philippines would have been in as good a shape as they are now had not the American Government taken the place of Spain, and had we remained under the Spanish Government, my answer would be a most emphatic negative. Who does not know that under Spanish rule we had to struggle and even to fight to obtain schools and other progressive institutions, while under the rule of the United States such institutions were voluntarily established by the Government? Who does not know that the Spanish Government was centralized and despotic all along the line from the municipalities up to the insular government, while to some extent the American Government is decentralized and representative? I will say to the gentleman, moreover, that I do not think that we should have made the progress we have made under American control or that we should have been given the same government we now have were we under the control of any other foreign Government. For this reason, if we are so unfortunate as to have to be forever subject to some master, we prefer a million times the United States in that relation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But if the gentleman asks me whether, in my opinion, had we been left with the government we had established, and had we been free from outside aggression we should have advanced under that government as much as we have actually advanced under the American régime, and whether that government would have been as liberal and representative at least as our present government, I say, yes; certainly. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if the gentleman wishes to know why I so believe, I shall tell him presently.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUEZON. I will in a minute. [Cries of "No!" on the Democratic side.] I will yield, Mr. Chairman; but before I yield again I wish to give the committee the reasons for my assertion:

THE EPHEMERAL PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC.

In the first place, the comparison of the government we had established with the present government of the islands is decidedly in favor of the former in so far as the representative character of each government is concerned.

The Filipino government which had been established had a constitution pronounced by that great statesman from Massachusetts, Senator Hoar, to be as good, as liberal, as progressive—framed as it was after the Constitution of the United States—as any in the world. I know that there has been constant—I had almost said intentional—misrepresentation of this Filipino government, its objects, and its achievements since the day when its upholders and framers were scattered by the American forces; but these misrepresentations can never destroy the truth of a historical fact.

Prof. Jorge Bocobo, of the Philippine University, in his recent historical monograph on the life of Felipe G. Calderon, affords the following accurate and able review of the facts regarding the first Republic of the Eastern Hemisphere:

On September 15, 1898, the Philippine Congress met at Barasoain, Province of Bulacan, composed of the best men that the island of Luzon could give. There were over 90 members, of whom about 40 were lawyers, 16 physicians, 5 pharmacists, 2 engineers, and 1 priest. The rest were merchants and farmers. Many of the representatives were graduates of European universities. Pedro A. Paterno, a lawyer, educated in Spain, and a distinguished publicist, was the president of the assembly. On September 17, Paterno delivered a thrilling speech in the name of human liberty. Among other things he said:

"Filipinos, to-day begins a new era; we are beholding the political resurrection of our people. Amidst the glooms of yesterday, amidst the graves of our heroes and martyrs, amidst the ruins of the past, there arises and stands the refulgent genius of liberty, embracing all the islands and uniting the Filipinos with bonds of holy brotherhood.

"Liberty is the ideal purpose of our existence on earth, the foundation of life and progress.

"Our past, the era of cruelty, of deceit, of slavery, has ended. We shall renew the history of the Philippines. * * *

"Filipinos, proceed! Let our steps be unflinching and ever forward; let them be steps of justice, of love, of harmony, and of charity; let us win the sympathy of the whole world with generous and humanitarian deeds; and let us write in the presence of the Lord, of the Supreme Being, the oath of our independence."

The rules of the Spanish Congress were temporarily adopted. Committees were immediately created, one of which was composed of 18 members, most of whom were able lawyers. Calderon likewise formed a part of the committee; he was requested to draft the constitution. The committee reported the proposed constitution, through Calderon, on October 8, 1898. The discussion of its articles in the congress began on October 26 and ended November 29, when it was approved and immediately transmitted to Aguinaldo for promulgation, which, however, was not done until December 23 on account of certain amendments recommended by the executive. The constitution was discussed article by article in 17 meetings, Calderon strongly defending his work from the attacks made. Among those who were prominent in the debates were Tomas G. del Rosario, Arcadio del Rosario, Joaquin Gonzales, Ignacio Villamor, Ambrosio Rianzares Bautista, Alberta Barretto, Aguedo Velarde, and Pablo Tecson Roque.

The committee reported:

"The work which the committee has the honor to submit to the consideration of the congress is one of real selection, for the execution of which this committee has borne in mind not only the French constitution, which has been made the basis, but also those of Belgium, Mexico, Brazil, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Guatemala, because these nations are believed to be the ones most similar to our people."

The first representative to take the floor was Arcadio del Rosario, who contended that the work of the committee should have been molded by the Constitution of the American Nation, which, "being the champion of liberty, is the most democratic nation, and with which the Filipino people are united by strong ties of friendship and sympathy." Calderon replied that the gratitude which the Filipino people owed the American Nation did not oblige them to adopt the institutions of the latter, taking into consideration the differences in their history, usages, and customs, and that the country was most akin, politically, to the South American Republics and other Latin nations. The latter opinion prevailed in the convention, which fact does not surprise those who know the forces that lie at the bottom of Filipino institutions, and upon which those who would require as a condition precedent to Philippine independence a form of government patterned after the American Republic should seriously reflect.

The constitution established a democratic republic, which was parliamentary or responsible, unitary, and unicameral. The principle of separation of powers was recognized, although the legislative branch was supreme.

The preamble was formulated in the following terms:

"We, the representatives of the Filipino people, legally assembled to establish justice, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty, imploring the aid of the Supreme Legislator of the Universe in order to attain these ends, have voted upon, decreed, and sanctioned the following political constitution."

This constitution was of a temporary nature, as the people had not yet elected delegates to a constitutional convention.

POLITICAL STATUS.

Title 1, headed "Of the Republic," contained the following declarations:

"The political association of all Filipinos constitutes a nation, whose State shall be known as Philippine Republic.

"The Philippine Republic is free and independent.

"Sovereignty resides exclusively in the people."

These fundamental statements defining the status of the Republic were expedient and timely, for the reason that the Malolos government was just coming into light. However, during the debate the objection was made that the second declaration was premature. Another point raised was that the proposed constitution did not determine the territorial limits of the Republic.

FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

Title 2, headed "Of the government" had but one article, as follows:

"The government of the Republic is popular, representative, alternative, and responsible, and is exercised by three distinct powers, which are denominated legislative, executive, and judicial.

"Two or more of these powers shall never be united in one person or corporation, nor shall the legislative power be vested in one individual."

The committee, referring to this important declaration, reported:

"The committee needs but a little effort to demonstrate the need of faithfully carrying out the doctrine of Montesquieu. * * * Hence the establishment, absolutely independent from the executive and judicial powers, of the national assembly, synthesis of popular sovereignty and genuine representative of the highest prerogative of the people, which is to make laws."

The foregoing must be read in connection with what Calderon said several years afterwards, that "the Congress of the Republic was the supreme power in the whole nation." It is clear, therefore—and a reading of the constitution will show it—that the English and French idea of making the legislature sovereign took hold of the Philippine convention. What causes led to the adoption of such principle? The revolution against Spain created a class of leaders who, on account of the troublous times, assumed ample powers. This was to a certain extent necessary for the time being, but the representatives saw the extreme peril involved by such state of affairs if continued indefinitely, so they curtailed the power of the executive. It must not be understood, however, that they were ever moved by the same reckless spirit which prevailed in the constituent assembly during the first years of the French Revolution. Nor is it to be supposed that Mabini, who was the adviser of Aguinaldo, ever desired to make the latter a dictator.

Neither the article under consideration nor any other provision stated whether the government was federal or unitary. But a simple glance at the constitution reveals the fact that the latter system was sanctioned. This feature of the constitution did not excite much controversy, as the centuries of Spanish centralization had ingrained in the habits of the people the practices of a unitary government.

RELIGION.

Title 3 deals with religion. Calderon proposed to follow the examples of Spain, Argentina, Bolivia, Peru, Colombia, Paraguay, Uruguay, Costa Rica, and Santo Domingo by the establishment of a State religion, the Roman Catholic. However, he was in favor of allowing the private exercise of any other religion, provided it was not contrary to morals and good customs and did not subvert the security of the nation. His idea was strongly opposed in the house, and this produced the most learned and eloquent debate during the life of that body. The opposition was led by Thomas G. del Rosario. The debate lasted four days, the speakers, especially Calderon and del Rosario, exhausting the arguments on both sides and showing such profound knowledge of history and the science of government that any legislature in the world would be proud to have on its record a similar discussion. The first vote was a tie—25 to 25—which indicates the irresistible logic of both sides. The president declined to cast his deciding vote, so another one was taken. At the second voting Representative Pablo Tecson Roque, who did not vote at the first one, voted in favor of the opposition. Title 3, therefore, read thus:

"The State recognizes the liberty and equality of all religious worships, as well as the separation of the church and state."

CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS.

Title 4 was headed thus: "Of Filipinos and their national and individual rights." This paragraph had 27 articles, in which the privileges and immunities of freemen were clearly and emphatically formulated. Aliens were likewise protected, as the new government was intended to win the support of the enlightened opinion of the world. The said rights were freedom from false and arbitrary imprisonment; writ of habeas corpus, security of private property; the prohibition of criminal convictions unless by a competent court and according to the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime; inviolability of private dwelling; liberty to choose one's residence and exemption of Filipinos from deportation; secrecy of correspondence; freedom of the press, right of petition, and to form associations not contrary to public morals; freedom of instruction, primary education being compulsory; right of aliens to engage in their profession or industrial pursuit; prohibition of special courts, except military and naval courts having jurisdiction over crimes against discipline; illegality of institutions permanently entailing property and prohibition of titles of nobility; and invalidity of taxes not imposed by the assembly or other competent authority and in accordance with the form prescribed by law. There were three articles of general character:

"No Filipino who may be in the full enjoyment of his civil and political rights shall be hindered in the free exercise thereof.

"Crimes committed on the occasion of the exercise of the rights stated in this title shall be punished by the courts according to the law of the land.

"The enumeration of the rights stated in this title does not imply the prohibition of others not especially consecrated."

Some of these articles had for their source the Spanish constitution of June 30, 1876. A few were taken from the Belgian constitution of February 30, 1831, such as article 29, which ordered that no previous authorization was necessary to prosecute public officials. The enumeration, however, was broader and more effective than that of the constitutions of Spain and Belgium. It compared favorably with the declaration of rights contained in the constitution of any country. This was because the representatives of the Filipino people cherished the idea of constructing a government founded upon the imperishable truths secured by the human race from kingcraft and upon those indestructible principles which constitute the mainstay of modern civilization.

However, it is doubted by many whether the Philippine Republic could have protected these constitutional liberties. It must be admitted, however, that the Filipino people, in consecrating these salutary principles at the first opportunity they had, without even waiting for the result of the diplomatic negotiations at Paris, and at the very time when militarism was at the height of its influence in the Philippine Republic, have shown that there is in the woof and warp of their social fabric a strong, firm attachment to liberty and law, a force which, had the Republic been recognized, would have summoned the energies of the nation in the upbuilding of a stable and progressive state. No one denies the possibility of disorder in a country with a newly organized government, but the question as to whether social convulsions are apt to become chronic depends largely, if not exclusively, upon the temper and habits of the people. Now, the Filipino people are peaceful and slow to condemn the enormity of abuses. They do not have the impetuousness of character and the revolutionary spirit of Spaniards and Spanish-Americans. Their respect for the constituted authorities has been observed by American officials and demonstrated by the undeniable fact that the Spanish Government, in spite of its intolerable oppression, easily maintained order for centuries with a small number of soldiers. If we take into account this trait of the Filipinos, it is reasonable to presume that the constitutional safeguards declared in the Malolos document would have been supported and upheld by a strong and steady government. But it is often said that the "politicians" would have produced anarchy and chaos and that such constitutional guaranties would have been a contemptible mockery. The experience of the Spanish-American republics is pointed out to strengthen the contention. But a mere presidential election can plunge most of the countries south of the United States into a civil war and thus force a suspension of individual rights, because the leaders take advantage of the indomitable nature and warlike tendencies of the people. In the Philippines only a question of life and death to the country could produce a serious commotion, because the Filipinos are law-abiding and self-restraint is a dominant feature of their national character.

The remaining titles, except the last two, treated of the structure of the Philippine republic. Titles 5 and 6 dealt with the legislative power; titles 7 to 9, with the executive department; title 10, with the judiciary; and title 11, with provincial and municipal governments. Title 12 was about finance, title 13 provided for the amendment of the constitution, and title 14 referred to constitutional oath and other matters. There were also some temporary provisions.

THE LEGISLATURE.

The legislature was unicameral, the examples of Greece, Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Santo Domingo having been followed. This system has been so generally rejected that an explanation of the reasons for its adoption in the islands would seem not to be out of place. There were three grounds upon which Calderon based his proposal: (1) That in the Philippines there were no conflicting interests, as in Europe and the United States; (2) that the country was in a formative period, and the existence of two chambers was liable to clog and embarrass the affairs of the state; and (3) that there might not have been enough men for both chambers. The Malolos congress did not devote much attention to this important question. It was simply taken for granted that there was no need of an upper house, which, it was feared, might have become the bulwark of special privileges. This action of the assembly demonstrated its overruling spirit, which was to banish from these shores all institutions which had a proneness to crush democratic polity. The writer is not unmindful of the fact that in most cases the purpose of an upper chamber is merely to secure calm and wise legislation, and that such body does not necessarily undermine popular government, but he is merely stating the primal thought of the Filipino representatives.

Another phase of the legislature which is strange to Americans but not to Europeans was its supremacy over the other powers. In the first place the parliamentary or responsible system, as opposed to the presidential or nonresponsible type, was preferred. Then a permanent committee of the legislature was created.

PARLIAMENTARY SYSTEM.

The Malolos constitution worked out the European system, as follows: The legislature elected the president of the republic. The latter, as well as the representatives, initiated legislative measures. He could dissolve the legislature, with the consent, however, of the assembly or of the permanent committee, in pursuance of articles 36 and 70. The latter article was taken from article 5 of the French law of February 25, 1875, with this difference, that in France the Senate gives the necessary consent to the dissolution of the National Assembly. Just how the Malolos assembly could have been dissolved in case of its refusal to adjourn did not appear in the constitution. Mabini proposed to eliminate said consent, but the assembly rejected his idea. The secretaries of the government were "collectively responsible to the assembly for the general policy of the government and individually for their own personal acts," which provision was a literal copy of article 6 of the French law of February 25, 1875; they could speak in congress. The house could pass a vote of censure, and every member thereof had a right to address an interpellation to the government.

Let us see whether the cabinet or parliamentary system was better for the Filipinos than the presidential system. This is an intricate problem, but two statements may be ventured: (1) That the parliamentary system was more expedient, because it was the one known to the Filipinos; and (2) that a nonresponsible government, the capital drawback of which is, according to Mr. Bryce, its "want of unity," would not have responded to the stern exigencies of the period. The first Philippine Commission criticized the system adopted by the Filipinos, saying:

"They (the Filipinos) had never dreamed of the simple American plan of giving the chief executive large powers and of holding him strictly accountable for the use made of them, his cabinet being merely an advisory body, and they had not risen to the great and fruitful conception of the complete separation and mutual independence of the executive, judicial, and legislative departments of government. It will take time and require visible demonstration of the American method of a strong executive who shall be completely independent of the legislature."

The above opinion is, of course, based upon the assumption that the American arrangement is better than the European plan. This question is one of the most delicate problems of modern political science, and the commission's view, therefore, merely states one side of the controversy. Had the Philippine congress given Aguinaldo a strong hand, the advocates of the theory of our supposed incapacity would now undoubtedly make a weighty argument of this fact to show that the republic was a sham and that political absolutism was the all-absorbing principle.

THE PERMANENT COMMITTEE.

The permanent committee of the legislature was an institution adopted from Mexico, Chile, Paraguay, Uruguay, Haiti, Guatemala, and Costa Rica, especially from the last two countries. It was to perform its duties during the recess of congress. Its powers were to decide whether impeachment proceedings could be instituted; to call a special session of the assembly, with the concurrence of the president; to dispatch pending business, so that the same could be discussed by congress; to call a special session of the legislature; and to take the place of the assembly in all its powers, except the making of laws.

NATURE OF A REPRESENTATIVE'S DUTY.

Another matter which deserves special attention in connection with the legislature is the duty of each member, as defined in the following provision:

"The members of the assembly shall represent the whole nation and not merely the electors choosing them. No representative shall receive any binding instruction from the electors."

This principle is seldom enunciated in constitutions. Yet it bespeaks the admirable foresight and broad statesmanship of the authors of the Philippine constitution. Universal experience vouches for the soundness of such doctrine. As President Wilson said:

"If the representative be a mere delegate, local interests must clash and contend in legislation to the destruction of all unity and consistency in policy; if however, the representative be not a mere delegate, but a fully empowered member of the central government, coherence, consistency, and power may be given to all national movements of self-direction."

OTHER POWERS OF THE ASSEMBLY.

Little remains to be said regarding the legislative department. The constitution did not enumerate the general powers of the congress, as written constitutions generally do. The usual parliamentary privileges were guaranteed. The assembly determined the rules of its proceedings, judged the elections and qualifications of its members and approved their resignations, and elected its officers. It tried all impeachments. No representative could accept any pension, employment, or commission with emolument, except the secretaryships of the executive department or other offices enumerated by special laws. The representatives held office for four years.

THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Titles 7 to 9, as above stated, treated of the executive department. The executive power was vested in a president of the republic, who exercised such power through his secretaries. In addition to what has already been said in connection with the cabinet government, the following provisions may be noticed: The president appointed to all civil and military positions, designated the secretaries, conducted diplomatic and commercial relations with other powers, looked after the prompt and full administration of justice, granted pardons, presided over state functions, and received envoys and ambassadors of foreign powers accredited to him. He needed the authority of a special law to alienate, cede, or exchange any part of Philippine territory; to incorporate any other territory with that of the Philippine Islands; to admit foreign troops into said territory; to ratify treaties of offensive and defensive alliance, special treaties of commerce, those stipulating the payment of subsidies to any foreign power, and all treaties which might have been binding upon Filipinos individually, provided that in no case could secret articles of a treaty annul public ones; to grant general amnesties and pardons and to coin money. He commanded the army and the navy, declared war and made and ratified peace, with the previous consent of the assembly. He promulgated the laws within 20 days; laws could be passed over his veto by a two-thirds vote. His election was for four years, and he could be reelected. He was responsible only in case of high treason. He had seven secretaries—for foreign affairs, of interior, finance, war and navy, public instruction, communications and public works, and agriculture, industry, and commerce. All his orders were to be signed by the proper secretary, without which requisite such orders were not to be obeyed.

THE JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT.

The judiciary was regulated by title 10. The chief justice and the attorney general were appointed by the national assembly in concurrence with the president and his secretaries. Every citizen had a right to institute criminal action against all members of the judiciary for crimes committed in the discharge of their duties. Although the constitution was silent on the subject, yet it is safe to presume that the courts did not have power to decide the constitutionality of laws, because the legislature was supreme, as already pointed out.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

Title 11 declared the principles upon which provincial and municipal governments were based. Local autonomy was protected as long as the Provinces and municipalities did not override the limits of their powers.

FINANCE.

The budget and taxation were dealt with in title 12. The executive department was to prepare the budget every year. No payment could be made but in accordance with an appropriation or other special law in the form and under the responsibility determined by law, which provision appears to be better and more explicit and efficacious than Article I, section 9, paragraph 7, United States Constitution, and section 5 of the Philippine bill; it is because Calderon was an economist, and he saw the importance of fixing the responsibility before law and public opinion for reckless management of the people's money. A special law was necessary for the disposal of property of the state and for the borrowing of money on the credit of the nation. The public debt was under the special protection of the nation. No debt was to be contracted unless the means with which to pay the same were approved at the same time, which shows that the men who organized the Philippine republic wanted to avoid the dangers to which some South American Republics are exposed when they fail to pay their debts to European nations.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Title 13 was about the amendment of the constitution by a constitutional convention; amendments were to be proposed by the assembly or the president. Lastly, there were some temporary provisions.

ESTIMATE OF THE PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC BY AN AMERICAN OBSERVER.

It is true that the government provided for by this constitution had hardly come into existence before it was destroyed; but this was not due to the machinations of any designing Filipino who sought to enslave our people, but to the exigencies of war. Indeed, almost upon the very inauguration of the Philippine Republic the hostilities between the American and Filipino forces were begun, and therefore martial law was unavoidably proclaimed.

Short as was the life of this government, however, and struggling, as it had to, for its very existence, first with Spain and later with the United States, it lived long enough to show that if it had been permitted to grow and maintain its place among the independent nations of the world it would have contributed its due share to the advancement of mankind. It is worth while to recall once more what two officials of the United States Navy reported to Admiral Dewey with regard to that government. I therefore quote a part of that report:

It has been my privilege to have been intimately associated with the Filipino people for a short time at a most interesting period of their history. With the permission of Admiral Dewey I spent the greater part of the months of October and November of 1898, in company with Paymaster W. B. Wilcox, United States Navy, in the interior of the northern part of the island of Luzon. It will be remembered that at that date the United States had not yet announced its policy in regard to the Philippines. The terms of the treaty with Spain were being negotiated by our commissioners at Paris, and the fate of the islands hung in the balance. In the meantime, the native population, taking matters into their own hands, had declared their independence from all foreign jurisdiction and had set up a provisional government, with Aguinaldo at its head. * * * Although this government has never been recognized and in all probability will go out of existence without recognition, yet it can not be denied that, in a region occupied by many millions of inhabitants, for nearly six months it stood alone between anarchy and order. The military forces of the United States held control only in Manila, with its environs, and in Cavite, and had no authority to proceed further, while in the vast remaining districts the representatives of the only other recognized power on the field were prisoners in the hands of their despised subjects. It was the opinion at Manila during this anomalous period in our Philippine relations, and possibly in the United States as well, that the state of affairs must breed something akin to anarchy. * * * I can state unreservedly, however, that Mr. Wilcox and I found the existing conditions to be much at variance with this opinion. During our absence from Manila we traveled more than 600 miles in a very comprehensive circuit through the northern part of the island of Luzon, traversing a characteristic and important district. In this way we visited seven Provinces, of which some were under immediate control of the central government at Malolos, while others were remotely situated, separated from each other and from the seat of government by natural divisions of land, and accessible only by lengthy and arduous travel. As a tribute to the efficiency of Aguinaldo's government and to the law-abiding character of his subjects, I offer the fact that Mr. Wilcox and I pursued our journey throughout in perfect security and returned to Manila with only the most pleasing recollections of the quiet and orderly life which we found the natives to be leading under the new régime.

PROGRESSIVE TENDENCIES OF THE PHILIPPINE REPUBLIC.

Mr. Chairman, among the things done by this ephemeral government, most significant for the future because they clearly indicate the tendencies of the governmental forces at work and what they would have done for the Filipino people had they endured, are the establishment of free and compulsory public education and provision for the creation of a government university. Does history record another instance of a newborn government which, during the few months of its existence and while it was still carrying on war, proceeded to take steps for the spread and promotion of public instruction among the masses? This fact alone fully justifies my presumption that the Filipino government would have done as well as the American Government, since it had been shown to have at least the same progressive tendencies, if not more actual interest, in the welfare of the people. And since the funds spent by the American Government now are paid by the Filipinos, who would have also supported the Filipino government, where would the difference have been? Surely no sane person would suggest that the results attained would have been different, because the same causes would have given different results, inasmuch as in one case the government is foreign and in another is native. Would any man pretend that in the case of education, for instance, Filipino students would have not shown the same capacity to learn under one government as under the other, considering that their intellectual ability is not due to any government?

We can cite Japan as affording an example of, or analogy to, the probable course of development in the Philippines had the islands been free from a foreign yoke. Japan, without falling under the rule of another nation, nevertheless made marvelous progress within a short time. If it be remembered that when Japan began her development she was much less familiar with occidental civilization than were we when we sought to organize our own government, it would seem apparent that we should have made at least the same advance. When Japan decided that in order to live she must adopt modern and occidental methods, she knew absolutely nothing of their technique, and yet how brief a time did she require to adopt those methods and even to surpass some of the older powers? What was it that Japan did? She sent her sons throughout the world to acquire learning, occidental instruction; she brought to her land men who could teach every branch of human knowledge and who could help to organize a modern government. Would anyone pretend to say that because of this foreign help Japan's was not a process of self-development and progress? Why could we not have accomplished, by using the same means, what Japan has accomplished? Who can say that Japan would have made as much progress had she fallen under a foreign yoke?

PARAMOUNT ADVANTAGE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Indeed, I question most seriously the statement that any nation can successfully direct the course of development that must be followed by another. The education of the individual is most successful when it affords the best vehicle for self-expression; the education of the nation or the race proceeds most naturally as a matter of internal evolution. Mistakes may be made, and when made they bring their own penalty. Now as always it is true that experience is the best teacher, and that only by endeavoring, aspiring, and striving can a government attain to practical efficiency. That has been conspicuously the history of the Anglo-Saxon race. Magna Charta was not bestowed by some friendly conqueror, but was the product of long years of struggle and effort. American constitutional government was not the gift of Howe, Cornwallis, or the King of England. Is there not a way of national progress from within, as compared with that stimulated from without, that gentlemen seem sometimes to overlook? Are we mindful of the fact that the one priceless advantage of self-development is that it proceeds along the proper lines, in accord with the tendencies, peculiarities, and special abilities of the people; in other words, that it is always a natural growth, while progress imposed from without may result in an unnatural type of evolution?

Mr. Chairman, without being overcritical, let me speak of this matter frankly. It is a fact that your work in the Philippines has not been as free from errors as the former officials of the Philippine Government in their self-laudation would have us believe. There have been mistakes—mistakes that were very expensive to the Filipino taxpayers; there have been injustices and wrongs. Some things have been overdone and other things have been neglected. I do not, however, on that account underrate the value of your work as a whole, and I gladly reiterate that considering all the circumstances you have done marvels. No government of men is free from shortcomings. I only wish to note the fact that some of the mistakes which your representatives have made in the Philippines, because of their unfamiliarity with the people and the country, would not have been made by us.

Mr. FESS. Now are you ready to yield?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes; I am ready. [Cries of "No!" "Go on!"] Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I understand from the chairman of the committee that he has not any more time to yield to this gentleman, and I ask in all fairness that he ought not to be interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that that is entirely in the hands of the gentleman himself.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. HELM. I want to make a request. I want to ask, in view of the fact that the gentleman from the Philippines, representing as he does a nation and is here speaking in their behalf, the only man who has a voice, that he be allowed to proceed, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has consumed his time, until he has finished his remarks, the time of the interruptions not to be taken out of the general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that matter is entirely in the control of the gentleman from the Philippines. If he does not desire to be interrupted, he will be protected in that.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from the Philippines be permitted to conclude his remarks, not to be taken out of the time that is allotted to general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the chairman can not submit that request to the committee. The House has fixed the time for general debate, and the committee has no power to extend it.

Mr. QUEZON. My five minutes are flying, Mr. Chairman, and I want to say another word. I hope this conversation will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from the Philippines.

Mr. QUEZON. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] if he can give me five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask this question: Would it be in order now for the committee to rise and the House extend the time of the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order at any time for the committee to rise.

Mr. HENRY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that the gentleman from Texas has not the floor for such a motion as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is true. The time belongs to the gentleman from the Philippines.

Mr. HENRY. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose, I will move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from the Philippines yield?

Mr. HENRY. I understood he did.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate more than I can say the kindness of the gentleman from Texas and the courtesy of the Members who desire to extend my time, but I am so much interested in the speedy consideration of this bill that I can not agree to the extension of general debate even for my own benefit. Therefore I must decline to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, my beloved friend Mr. HENRY, whom I thank with all my heart just as if he had secured more time for me.

FREEDOM AGAINST WEALTH AND PROSPERITY.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me return to the discussion at the point where I was compelled by interruptions to break off. In what I have said I tried to show that there was no blasphemy in my asserting that we could have made the same intellectual and material progress under our own rule that we have made under yours. But I will say that were I to admit that what you have done along those lines would have never been equaled or even approached by our own efforts, this fact could never justify before the court of justice, and surely not in our estimation, the continuation or permanency of American control over us. I might admit without mental reservation that in 15 years of American occupation we have been given, at our own cost, more and better schools, solidly built roads, more sanitary and more beautiful cities, and so forth; and yet I should say, and my people would say, that all the schools in the world, combined with the most comfortable railroads, the most excellent sanitation, the most artistic buildings, and everything else that makes for enlightenment and comfort is no compensation for the loss of freedom. "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the American people have been too long beguiled by speeches telling of the wonderful material and educational progress that is said to have been made under your guidance in the islands. Too many such assurances have been put forward within years past, their purpose being apparently to conceal the real and great issue involved in the Philippine problem. I repeat, and I mean every word, that intellectual advancement, public improvements, and material prosperity alone will not make the Filipinos happy and contented under your rule nor induce them to concede the necessity of that rule. If any man thinks that he can purchase the Filipino people with material prosperity and intellectual advancement, and so make them forget their rights as men and as a nation, he is utterly mistaken. All these beneficent things to meet our wishes must be accompanied by a definite promise that we may look forward to a future time when an absolutely independent government will be granted us, and must in the meantime be coupled with the immediate establishment of a government which shall afford us power to determine how the present development of the country shall be carried on. Ah, Mr. Chairman, if to our misfortune we must be forever destined to be ruled by a foreign power, better would it be to leave us in misery and in ignorance! The demands of starving stomachs may prevent our minds from realizing the burden of slavery, while our ignorance would prevent us from knowing what freedom means, and, therefore, from desiring to attain it. Under these circumstances we should have less comfort in life, but we should be less miserable. We should at least have that peace of mind which would give us some happiness. Can not you, Mr. Chairman, sympathize with us? Ask the bird if it prefers a golden cage to the air and the sunshine; or ask Patrick Henry to explain his choice between liberty and life. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it should be easy for you to understand how we feel. Forget for a moment that you are a citizen of the greatest and most powerful Commonwealth upon the face of this earth. Close your eyes to the present and, heeding the testimony of the past, go back to those days, fortunately for you long since gone, when instead of possessing a country extending from the Dominion of Canada to the Rio Grande and from the Atlantic to the Pacific you were confined to the region east of the Mississippi River, and when, instead of 100,000,000, you were but 3,000,000 souls. Remember how your forefathers felt when they were as we are now struggling for freedom. And, finally, bear in mind that the love for liberty in human hearts has not decreased, but, on the contrary, has grown as human civilization has advanced. Sir, you who at one time were under foreign rule and who were to be kept in that condition of subjection on the ground that you could do nothing for yourselves, that you were too ignorant to establish any suitable government, or too unpatriotic to be permitted to take care of your own country, you can sympathize with us. You can not blame us if our hearts bleed when we are told that the United States Government must forever remain in the Philippines because we are so incapable or so unpatriotic as not to be intrusted with our own affairs. So long as these words sound in Filipino ears we should not be men were we complaisantly and calmly to assent to permanent American control in the Philippines. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, one gentleman to whom I had promised 10 minutes has generously said that he desired it to go to the gentleman from the Philippines. I yield it to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the other gentleman who was kind enough to renounce his time in my favor. If I can proceed without any more interruptions I hope to be able to devote these 10 minutes to the consideration of the bill itself, though without going into details, but merely pointing out its most salient features.

TWO PRIME FEATURES OF THE BILL.

This bill is composed of a preamble and of legislative provisions. The preamble states the object of the bill, which is to give the people of the Philippine Islands ample opportunity to demonstrate to the world their capacity for self-government, so that, after such a demonstration shall have been made, they may be granted absolute and complete independence. The preamble recites that it was never the purpose of the American people to make the War with Spain an occasion for territorial aggrandizement or commercial expansion, and that it has always been the intent of the American people to recognize the independence of the Philippines as soon as a stable government shall have been established therein. The legislative provisions of the bill offer the Filipino people, as the preamble indicates, every opportunity to demonstrate their capacity for self-government by placing in their hands general legislative powers, with only such limitations as will enable the Government of the United States to prevent any possible misuse of those powers.

MAIN CHANGES IN THE PRESENT ORGANIC ACT.

Mr. Chairman, the substantial changes which the legislative provisions of this bill propose to make in the organic law of the Philippine Islands now in force are two in number, as follows: First, the increase of the powers now vested in the Philippine Government; and, second, the substitution for the present system of government, mainly responsible to the President of the United States, of a government which shall be responsible to the Filipino people. The first change is brought about by conferring upon the Philippine Government general legislative powers and by specifically authorizing it to enact land, timber, mining, coinage, and tariff laws with the approval of the President of the United States. The second change is secured by providing that both branches of the legislature shall be elected by the Filipino people and that the appointment of Government officers shall be subject to confirmation by the Senate.

NECESSITY OF INCREASING THE POWERS OF THE PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT.

That the powers of the Philippine Government should be enlarged, as proposed in this bill, should be a foregone conclusion to every student of political science. It should be done as a matter of principle, because, if the Philippines are not to become an integral part of the American Nation, like the States of the Union, but, on the contrary, they are to be kept a distinct and separate nation, as they really are, their government should have now, even before it is declared an independent commonwealth, all the legislative powers that it needs to promote the growth of the country upon its own national lines.

From the standpoint of expediency the necessity of vesting the Philippine Government with these powers becomes acute. Indeed the whole experience of the world shows that legislative powers vested in a body thousands of miles away from the people and not responsible to them do more harm than good. This is because under these conditions such powers are seldom exercised, and when they are they are usually employed in the wrong way. The utter impossibility of arousing interest on the part of the legislature in the affairs of a people so far removed and the difficulties which prohibit such a legislature from supplying itself with the information to legislate wisely inevitably lead to this result.

But it is not enough, Mr. Chairman, that governmental powers be vested in some body that is on the ground; they must be granted to the Filipino people themselves, first, because self-government is the birthright of every people regardless how that right is exercised; and, second, because the Filipino people, as far as they have had the opportunity, have shown that they possess the capacity to govern themselves.

EVIDENCES OF FILIPINO CAPACITY FOR SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Chairman, the Filipino people have sufficiently demonstrated that they can safely be intrusted with the powers granted in this bill. I should be losing precious time were I to tell the committee that since the early days of the American régime both the municipalities and the Provinces have been successfully governed by Filipinos elected by the people. This is a fact admitted even by those most opposed to Filipino self-government. It is also unnecessary for me to say that the Filipinos occupying appointive positions in the insular government are fully justifying themselves, as is demonstrated by the fact that not only are they kept in office but that their number has been continuously increasing. Had these appointments been failures they would have been recalled and no further appointments of a like kind would have been made. Filipinos so appointed hold places on the supreme bench and in the courts of record. Every justice of the peace, the secretary of finance and justice, five members of the Philippine Commission, the attorney general, the solicitor general, the provincial fiscals (prosecuting attorneys), some chiefs and assistant chiefs of bureaus, and the majority of the civil-service employees are Filipinos.

As to the legislative capacity of the Filipinos, the work of the Philippine Assembly since 1907 and the achievements of the Philippine Legislature since, and the appointment of a majority of Filipinos on the commission, which became practically a Filipino body, furnish conclusive testimony to the intelligence, culture, and devotion to duty of our Filipino legislators. It will not be amiss, Mr. Chairman, to cite to this committee the testimony of Americans prominent in the councils of each of the three parties in the United States.

Ex-President Taft, who is considered by many as one of the Americans best informed on things Philippine, said in his special report on the Philippines as Secretary of War:

> The Philippine Assembly has shown a most earnest desire, and its leaders have expressed with the utmost emphasis their intention to labor for the material prosperity of the Philippines. * * * In other words, thus far the assembly has not manifested in any way that obstructive character which those who have prophesied its failure expected to see.

This testimony is supported by ex-President Roosevelt, who in a message to Congress used the following language:

THE PHILIPPINES.

> Real progress toward self-government is being made in the Philippine Islands. The gathering of a Philippine legislative body and Philippine Assembly marks a process absolutely new in Asia, not only as regards Asiatic colonies of European powers but as regards Asiatic possessions of other Asiatic powers; and, indeed, always excepting the striking and wonderful example afforded by the great Empire of Japan, it opens an entirely new departure when compared with anything which has happened among Asiatic powers which are their own masters. Hitherto this Philippine Legislature has acted with moderation and self-restraint, and has seemed in practical fashion to realize the eternal truth that there must always be government, and that the only way in which any body of individuals can escape the necessity of being governed by outsiders is to show that they are able to restrain themselves, to keep down wrongdoing and disorder. The Filipino people, through their officials, are therefore making real steps in the direction of self-government.

An American scholar resident in the Philippines, Dr. Robertson, who has been carefully studying the conduct of the Philippine Assembly, wrote of this body as follows:

> When one considers the lack of opportunity that the Filipinos have had for representative government, this extraordinary session marks an epoch in the history of the Philippine Islands. This remark is no idle panegyric, but is based on actual contact and conversation with various members of the assembly, as well as attendance at many of the open meetings of the assembly. * * *
>
> The assembly just closed was remarkable in several respects; for the discipline exercised by the speaker; for the great earnestness displayed by the representatives in general; for their dignity of bearing; and for their freedom from jingoism; and, outwardly at least, from party passion—outwardly, I say, because considerable party passion and personal feeling did at times creep into committee and secret meetings. In general, it may be said that this assembly in its quietness and dignity of action has established a precedent that can well be taken as a form for future sessions. * * *
> While it might be said that this special session was called upon to consider but a limited range of subjects, and can not, therefore, be taken as a typical session, where there is more at stake, yet an examination of the various bills introduced and discussed shows a considerable range of interests, and those interests among the most vital in the Philippines. That they were treated in so earnest and dignified a manner must score a point in favor of the working of the assembly. On the whole, there was an absence of bombast and fireworks that was refreshing. * * *
> Most of the delegates were exceedingly in earnest and worked up to the measure of their ability. * * * Conversations with various of the delegates showed them to be, on the whole, men of relative superior intelligence, alert, and anxious for the best good of the Philippines. This last is a very significant fact. The delegates, although elected to represent a certain locality, are keenly alive to the fact that they represent all the Philippines and must obtain the best good for the whole country. * * * If the leaders proceed with the wisdom that Rizal would have had, it is not too much to say that the Filipino Assembly will have permanently an honored place among the deliberative assemblies of the world.

These observations as to the results attained by the establishment of a popularly elected branch of our legislature are corroborated by the opinion rendered by the present Governor General of the Philippines on the work of the Philippine Legislature during a year where both of its branches, controlled by Filipinos, assumed under most trying circumstances the legislative powers of the Philippine Government. Mr. Harrison, in his annual message to the Philippine Legislature, on February 6, 1914, said:

> Gentlemen of the legislature, nearly four months ago I addressed you for the first time. I came to you then with high expectations of your legislative ability. Those expectations have now been justified. During the regular session which has just elapsed your labors for the public welfare have been earnest, industrious, and efficient. Your course has been one of progress and economy of the public moneys. Many laws of great importance have been enacted. Among these is the general appropriation act for the current expenditures of the Government, the first to become law since 1910. This act effected many reforms in the fabric of this government and has met with widespread approval. Peace and prosperity throughout the islands and tranquillity of the public mind bear evidence of this approval. The President of the United States has expressed his appreciation, and the Secretary of War has sent the following message:
> "I congratulate you on the passage for the first time in three years of a general appropriation bill, and on the fact that the bill was passed unanimously by both houses. I have no doubt but that there were, as to a great many features, differences of opinion, but it is a source of satisfaction to the department that such differences were satisfactorily adjusted. Please extend to both houses of the Philippine Legislature my congratulations on this event, and express to them my hope that this is but an indication of what may be expected in the future."

The general appropriation act, in many ways, increases the efficiency of the Government service, and will result in a saving of over ₱2,000,000 in our current expenses. We must now guard jealously the economies already effected and proceed to consider further reforms and retrenchment of unnecessary expenditures. By these methods we shall entirely avert the deficit in the general unappropriated funds of the treasury which faced us at the opening of the October session. And, further, we may also enact now a law appropriating funds for the public works and continue in every respect the previous admirable progress in the construction of roads, bridges, and artesian wells. For the framing of such an appropriation bill, as well as for a proper deliberation and careful scrutiny of many other measures of public moment, I have called this special session of the legislature to sit from to-day until the 28th of February, 1914. During the course of your proceedings I shall make to you certain recommendations for your consideration.

The art of government is, in many respects, the highest of the sciences. You have already demonstrated the ability of a legislature composed almost entirely of Filipinos to enact difficult and progressive legislation. In the days to come you will maintain the high standard you have already raised. Many eyes are upon you; many minds are fixed upon your every act. The time is one of utmost importance to the ultimate achievement of Filipino aspirations. The people of the United States are your friends. All of them, I am sure, wish earnestly for a continuation of the successful outcome of your labors.

A more detailed account of the work of this "Filipinized" legislature is given in the following letter written by the Manila correspondent of one of the metropolitan newspapers of this country:

MANILA, July 25.

Nearly 10 months have elapsed since October 6, 1913, when the new Governor General of the Philippines, Francis Burton Harrison, of New York, landed in Manila, and half an hour later delivered his now famous "Luneta address," announcing the intention of President Wilson to give the Filipinos a majority on the Philippine Commission. The announcement was hailed with joy by the Filipinos, by the majority of Americans and foreigners in the islands with misgivings and forebodings of political disaster.

As to the success of the experiment, opinions vary. In general, however, it may be stated that adverse criticism of the "Filipinized" legislature has largely subsided, if not entirely ceased.

How far has the faith of the present administration at Washington in the ability of the Filipinos to assume complete control of the legislative branch of the government been justified? What effect upon general sociological, political, and business conditions has the new order of things produced? Would the United States be justified in extending still further political autonomy to the Filipinos? This letter will be confined to a recital of facts and figures bearing on the accomplishments of the last session of the Philippine Legislature, the first in which both branches were under Filipino control.

THE "FILIPINIZED" GOVERNMENT.

The assembly, or lower branch of the Philippine Legislature, has, since its establishment in 1907, been composed exclusively of Filipinos elected by popular vote. The Philippine Commission is appointed by the President of the United States, with the consent of the Senate. Formerly it was composed of five Americans and four Filipinos, the Governor General being president of the body. By the appointment of four new Filipino commissioners and the reappointment of Commissioner Palma the Filipinos obtained last October a majority of one.

The three new American commissioners, who, with the Governor General, compose the racial minority, were also appointed in October, but did not reach the islands until the regular session of the legislature was practically over; so that whatever credit or discredit might attach to the last session of the Philippine Legislature must be placed on the shoulders of the Filipino commissioners, the Philippine Assembly, and, to a certain extent, upon those of the Governor General.

While it is true that the Governor General, because of the authority of the Washington Government behind him, and because of the powers and prerogatives vested in him by the organic act of 1903, can wield a vast influence upon the shaping of legislation, particularly in the upper house, yet, in fact, the chief executive did not avail himself of nearly the full influence inherent in his position.

Mr. Harrison desired to test the actual capacity of his Filipino confrères; therefore he effaced himself almost completely from the routine work of legislation. Of the bills introduced, but a negligible percentage were introduced by the Governor General, by far the major portion being framed and presented by the Filipino commissioners, who had been designated individual committees to deal with the various special phases of the legislative business.

WORK OF THE FILIPINO COMMISSIONERS.

Commissioner Mapa, the only Filipino commissioner having departmental supervision, or a portfolio, as they call it here, handled all bills pertaining to his own department, that of finance and justice; Commissioner De Veyra prepared bills having to do with the department of commerce and police; Commissioner Singson took care of the department of the interior legislation, with the exception of matters concerning the Moro Province, which were largely attended to by Commissioner Ilustre, who is a native of that Province. Commissioner Palma was intrusted with matters pertaining to the department of public instruction, and presided in the absence of the Governor General.

During practically the entire regular session the American commissioners intrusted with the three last-named portfolios, were absent, and the Filipino commissioners, in addition to their legislative duties, took care of the administrative work of these departments, which embrace in their jurisdiction the entire executive branch of the government.

The Governor General took but small part in the detail work of legislation in the commission. As a matter of fact, he absented himself time and again from the sessions of that body. On not a single occasion did he make use of his veto power to coerce or impede legislation. His congressional experience served him in good stead in parliamentary procedure, and he conducted the proceedings of the commission with system and dispatch.

It should be remembered, however, that in his "Luneta speech" and in his first message to the legislature he had previously outlined the policies of the administration with respect to finances, the civil service, "big business," and the relations of the governing to the governed. He had laid down a sweeping economy program, calculated to correct the alleged extravagances of the previous administration; he had declared the administration's intention more rapidly to substitute Filipinos for Americans in the civil service; he had announced that "business is intended to serve the government, not the government to serve business"; and he had assured and convinced the members of the legislature that the administration intended to give the Filipinos a fair test of their fitness for self-government.

The commission, as well as the assembly, adhered closely to the lines laid out for them in the Governor General's message. This was not due, as might be inferred, to servile compliance on their part with the will of the chief executive, but rather to their sympathy with the general principles and policies enunciated by Mr. Harrison. The fact that the Filipinos can not be led like sheep by the Governor General was evidenced in the discord and practical stoppage of constructive legislation that prevailed during the previous régime dominated by Mr. Forbes.

During the session just past, for the first time in the history of Philippine bicameral legislation under the American régime, there existed perfect accord in aims and principles between the Governor General and the two houses of the legislature. The two houses worked in harmony, and in but one instance—concerning the passage of a dental-practice regulation bill—did they fail to come to an agreement. There had been more or less constant friction between the assembly and the commission. The assembly always has stood for greater economy in governmental expenditures, more rapid "Filipinization" of the civil service, and greater consideration for the rights, aspirations, and customs of the people.

The commission in the past seemed to take the attitude that the Filipinos were unable to assure safe and sane forms of conduct with respect to nearly all matters arising for settlement by legislative action. The labors of the assembly were depreciated and ridiculed by the mass of Americans and foreigners over here, as well as by the local American press.

In 1910 the two houses came to a deadlock over the general appropriation bill, the most important measure arising in the legislature, and the Governor General was forced to resort to the expedient, prescribed by law, of continuing the last jointly approved appropriation bill for another year by executive order, although the measure was considered by the lower house extravagant and unfair to the people.

INFLUENCE OF A NEW SPIRIT.

The "new era" heartened and quickened the legislative machinery. More bills were passed than at any previous session. A much greater percentage of bills originating and passing in the commission was approved by the lower house than ever before, and a surprisingly large number of excellent bills of prime importance to the islands and in line with the best and most progressive modern thought were enacted into law. An appropriation bill was passed which bids fair to turn the threatened deficit in the insular treasury into a sizable surplus, and an entirely new system of apportioning and appropriating Government funds for the different bureaus was evolved and provided for.

The following comparative table will make clear the quantitative results of the last session as compared with that of previous sessions:

	Sessions.
	1910–11	1911–12	1912–13	1913–14
Bills introduced in commission	63	69	71	103
Bills passed by commission	48	52	61	69
Commission bills enacted by legislature	17	17	18	50
Bills introduced in assembly	484	518	421	398
Bills passed by assembly	98	181	131	169
Assembly bills enacted by legislature	33	69	51	51
Percentage of commission bills enacted by legislature	35	25	30	72
Percentage of assembly bills enacted by legislature	34	38	39	30
Percentage of bills passed by either house enacted by legislature	34	37	36	42

It will be seen that whereas the percentage of bills passed by the assembly and enacted by the legislature fell from 39 last year to 30 for this year's session, the percentage of commission bills passed by the legislature rose from 30 to 72.

The decrease in the number of assembly bills enacted was largely due to the fact that the extraordinary labors involved in the framing in the general appropriation bill resulted in the holding over of a great many bills in the lower house without action. Moreover, due to the renaissance of the national spirit, there was more activity in the lower house in the matter of framing bills and more initiative in the presentation of measures. Then, the commission was very cautious in its consideration of bills arising in the lower house, and brought its superior wisdom and experience to bear on measures arising there. It thus performed its intended function as a check upon the more youthful and exuberant spirits of the assembly.

CONFIDENCE IN THE COMMISSION.

On the other hand, the unbounded confidence of the assembly in the commission, a new condition in Philippine legislation, is demonstrated by the fact that 72 per cent of bills passed in the upper house were approved by the lower chamber. Compare this figure with the 30, 25, and 35 of the three previous years.

During the last session 101 bills were enacted into law. For the three previous years the figures are 69, 86, and 50.

In the session of 1910–11, outside of a "negotiable instruments" act, a bill for the reorganization of the justice of the peace courts, and a bill granting a gas franchise for the city of Manila, no important measures were enacted. In the following session the most important laws passed were an act permitting the utilization of the "gold standard and reserve" fund for public-works loans to Provinces and municipalities; a warehouse-receipt act, governing the use of this class of business documents; an automobile law, fixing speed limits, etc.; and an act providing for systematic government inspection of the municipal police forces in the islands. This latter law was never enforced for lack of appropriation. During the session of 1912–13 the only important laws enacted were a bill providing for the registration of patents, a law regulating the practice of veterinary medicine, and a bill appropriating funds for a portion of the cadastral survey of the islands.

QUALITATIVE VIEW OF LAST SESSION.

The list of important bills for the 1913–14 session is as follows:

(1) General appropriation bill: This measure was the principal source of the present administration's unpopularity among the Americans in the islands. It did away with reimbursable appropriations. It reduced all salaries above $3,000 from 5 to 10 per cent. It provided for a reduction of the American force in most bureaus and the placing of Filipinos in more responsible positions. It did away with unnecessary expenditures and gave the bureau chiefs less leeway in handling public funds. It eliminated some positions entirely, and even eliminated an entire bureau, which had been a drag upon the Government's finances in the previous administration. It consolidated other bureaus into more efficient and economical organizations. It was a bill intended to accomplish the principal object of the government's financial policy—economy. The bill was framed by the assembly, amended, and redrafted by the commission, and acepted by the assembly, after conference, with but few changes.

When it was made public a terrible howl went up from the unfortunate Americans who were deprived of positions or suffered reduction in salary. Many resigned. The bill was derided and pointed to as a horrible instance of the incapacity of the Filipinos for self-government. As a matter of fact, it was a creditable piece of legislative work—one that few legislatures in the world could have accomplished with equal thoroughness and dispatch. As a result of this bill government expenditures for the first four months of the present fiscal year showed a saving of approximately $1,000.000 as compared with last year, and no one has noticed any appreciable slackening up in the functioning of the government machinery. Had this bill not been passed salaries and bureau expenditures would have eaten up all the government's revenues, not leaving a centavo for public works.

ANTISLAVERY BILL PASSED.

(2) An antislavery bill, which Worcester claimed could not be passed in the assembly.

(3) A judiciary bill, entirely reorganizing the higher judiciary system in the islands.

(4) An internal-revenue act, totally revising the old internal-revenue act. Great opposition arose to this bill because it provided for a small tax on the output of gold mines. This provision was finally eliminated, but will be passed in the next session.

(5) A bill abolishing the bureau of navigation: This bureau operated a fleet of vessels for which there was no real use except to serve as junketing ships for the higher officials. It ran a marine repair shop on an extravagant basis and supported several superfluous and mostly incompetent high-salaried officials. It was apportioned between the bureau of customs and the bureau of public works. Much wailing arose over the passage of this measure.

(6) A bill establishing a board of public utilities commissioners, patterned after the New Jersey public utilities law. Indignation in railroad and corporation circles.

(7) A bill limiting the sale of friar lands to individuals to 16 hectares and the sale to corporations to 1,024 hectares. One hectare is about 2½ acres.

(8) A law standardizing the hemp product of the island: In the past different concerns had different brands and different classifications and marks. This resulted in much inconvenience and dissatisfaction to the importers abroad. This bill was denounced by the hemp brokers as unfair, but the manufacturers abroad approved it and welcomed it. The dealers and growers will greatly benefit by it as well.

(9) An antiopium bill, increasing the severity of sentences for the use and importation of opium.

(10) A patent-medicine bill providing for the labeling and advertising of patent medicines and so-called therapeutic appliances, and providing adequate punishment for infractors.

(11) A wireless telegraph bill, grating a franchise to the Marconi Wireless Co. for the establishment of a station.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I have given the committee enough evidence regarding the capacity of the Filipino people to legislate for themselves. I might well stop here, since no further proof is needed. There is, however, one more witness whom I can not omit, for I feel that as he is himself a great legislator the committee should not be deprived of his views on this subject.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] during his rather hasty trip to the islands last year paid a visit to the Philippine Assembly. The assembly received the gentleman with all the honors becoming a Member of the Congress of the United States. Speaker Osmeña greeted the distinguished visitor with warm words of welcome and asked him to convey to the Congress the respect and regard of the people of the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from Minnesota, after graciously returning the greetings of the speaker, said something in praise of the work done by the assembly. It had been my fortune and honor to act as a translator for the gentleman on that occasion, a difficult task, indeed, for his speech was, as usual, very eloquent. It was almost impossible for me to find the corresponding words in Spanish, and I am not even sure that I quite understood what he said. If I did not, then I unintentionally and regretfully misrepresented him to the assembly. The gentleman can tell me now whether I have or have not misrepresented him. I shall not undertake to repeat his own eloquent words, but what in effect I understood him to say is that the assembly had done well and had shown its capacity to legislate.

Mr. MILLER. Has the gentleman finished the quotation?

Mr. QUEZON. That is not all that the gentleman said, but for my purpose that is all I care to cite now.

Mr. MILLER. It was so long?

Mr. QUEZON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I want to say that the gentleman's translation at the time was perfect, as I gathered from my knowledge of the Spanish, and that his statement to-day is perfect, with one slight exception.

Mr. QUEZON. What is that?

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman said I told the Philippine Assembly it had done splendidly. I told them they had done splendidly and they had done nobly——

Mr. QUEZON. That is true.

Mr. MILLER. And that they had demonstrated their capacity as legislators, and that I was in favor of permitting them to elect a senate. So I indorse all that the gentleman said and make it stronger.

Mr. QUEZON. I am glad to learn that I succeeded in understanding and translating the speech of my distinguished friend. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is just one more thing I wish to say regarding the assembly, in connection with a statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. The gentleman suggested that because out of the 56 members of the constitutional convention held in 1787, 29 were college bred, this fact indicated conclusively the grade of literacy and political capacity in the American colonies.

What would the gentleman from Ohio say, Mr. Chairman, if I told him what is true, that the members of the Philippine Assembly are 81, and that the proportion of college bred among them is 100 per cent, for every one of them is college bred? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

CONFIRMATION OF APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. Chairman, I shall now take up the matter of the confirmation by the Senate of the Governor General's appointments. This is one of the most important features of the bill, and it ought not to require much argument to convince the committee of its wisdom. You have this provision in your Federal Constitution, because your fathers knew the dangers of giving too much power to the Executive. If an elective President can not be trusted with unlimited discretion in the appointment of the administrative officials of the Government, how could anyone believe that an appointive Governor General could be safely intrusted with such a discretion? Were the Governor General of the Philippines to make his appointments without being subject to confirmation by another branch of the government, he could easily equal the Czar of Russia in so far as absolute power is concerned, for it must be remembered that the veto power vested by this bill in the Governor General is, to all practical intents, unlimited. The Governor General of the Philippines will, under the terms of this bill, appoint the members of his cabinet or the heads of the executive departments; he would further appoint all those officials now appointed by him, or, in other words, every judge of the courts of first instance, every justice of the peace, every provincial fiscal (prosecuting attorney), every chief and assistant chief of bureau, every provincial treasurer; in fine, every officer of the judiciary, excepting the members of the supreme court, and the most important positions of the executive branch of the Philippine Government. Can anyone fail to see what a tremendous power this lodges in the hands of a single man? How dangerous a weapon for an unscrupulous or incompetent Governor General! It might be harmless, nay, beneficial, in the case of a patriotic Governor General like Francis Burton Harrison, but there are not many of Mr. Harrison's type, even in the United States, and it is enough that there be a possibility of an unworthy Governor General to justify the adoption of legislative measures that will prevent him from doing his worst. Restrictive laws are written for the wicked, and they are essential to the protection of society as long as humanity has the weakness of the flesh.

NEW GRANT OF FRANCHISE.

Mr. Chairman, I have touched upon the most important changes in our present organic law as contemplated in the bill. There are only two more innovations which deserve comment at this time.

The qualifications of voters now required by law in the Philippines are as follows:

SEC. 13. Qualifications of voters: Every male person 23 years of age or over who has had a legal residence for a period of six months immediately preceding the election in the municipality in which he exercises the suffrage, and who is not a citizen or subject of any foreign power, and who is comprised within one of the following three classes:

(a) Those who, prior to the 13th of August, 1898, held the office of municipal captain, gobernadorcillo, alcalde, lieutenant, cabeza de barangay, or member of any ayuntamiento.

(b) Those who own real property to the value of ₱500, or who annually pay ₱30 or more of the established taxes.

(c) Those who speak, read, and write English or Spanish shall be entitled to vote at all elections: Provided, That officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines of the Army or Navy of the United States shall not be considered as having acquired legal residence within the meaning of this section by reason of their having been stationed in the municipalities for the required six months.

The bill reenacts these provisions, but it adds that those who can read and write in any language may also vote. Such an innovation is wise and right. There are many literate Filipinos educated in the use of their own language who, because they could neither write Spanish or English, are disqualified to vote under the present law. It is unjustifiable to deprive of the franchise those Filipinos who can inform themselves of the rights and duties of citizenship through native literature. The proposed innovation would at once increase the number of the Philippine electorate and would put a stop to the assertions of the past few years that the paucity of electors in the islands in proportion to the rest of the population furnishes evidence of the incapacity of Filipinos for self-government.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NONCHRISTIAN TRIBES.

Mr. Chairman, there is one provision in the bill which I must admit I swallowed only after much effort and which I have not fully as yet digested. I refer to the proposed plan for governing the non-Christian native inhabitants of the Philippines. There are about 600,000 of these non-Christians in the total 8,000,000 population of the islands. About one-half of them are pagans and the other half Mohammedans. The immense majority, while uncivilized in the sense that they have not accepted occidental civilization, are not, however, savages. They live in villages and towns; they have their own homes and farms; and they follow regular pursuits of life. They live under well-organized municipal and provincial governments, and they pay their local taxes. A few of the pagans are nomads, and a few others up to a few years ago were head hunters.

We have all heard the ridiculous assertions that there is a lack of sympathy between the Christian and the non-Christian Filipinos, and that the former can not be trusted to govern the latter. As for placing the Mohammedans, or so-called Moros, under the control of a Filipino government, we are warned of the horrors that would follow such attempt. Of course there is no more ground for such statements than there is for the charges regarding the incapacity of the Christian Filipinos to govern themselves. Both aspersions are due to the same cause—the determination of certain persons to keep in their own hands the tempting job of ruling both non-Christian and Christian Filipinos.

The majority members of the insular committee had, as I understand it, to face the fact that so much has been said about this supposed antagonism between the Christians and the non-Christians that they had to make some concession to those who in good faith fear that too radical a change in the present government of these non-Christians might result in disaster. With a rather conservative step it was hoped to silence in part the pessimistic prophets. As regards the increase of the powers of the Christian Filipinos to govern themselves, while opposition was to be expected, the old battle cry of Filipino incapacity could be answered effectively with the mere recitation of proofs to the contrary already afforded by the Filipinos. But such an answer could not be made were it proposed to turn the non-Christians completely over to their Christian brothers, because the Christian Filipinos have had no opportunity thus far to govern those wards of the Nation. For this reason some sort of compromise measure was adopted.

According to the organic law, the government of the non-Christians is exclusively vested in the appointive Philippine Commission, thus allowing the Filipino people no participation whatever in the process of government. The commission could appropriate from funds in the treasury raised by taxing the Christian Filipinos any sum it chose to spend for the benefit of the non-Christians without consulting the assembly, and even in the face of its protests. This power has been abused in the past. The bill proposes that the government of these non-Christians shall be vested in the Philippine Legislature provided for in the act, but that they shall be represented in the legislature by 2 senators and 10 representatives appointed by the Governor General.

It is evident that this new proposal is better and less undemocratic than the present system, and I therefore accept it as a lesser and only a temporary evil—temporary because the bill provides that when the newly created legislature shall have convened it may revise this undemocratic arrangement.

PRACTICAL TEST OF FILIPINO CAPACITY OFFERED BY THE BILL.

Mr. Chairman, there is one point that the promoters of the bill can make, after all is said on both sides of the question, that must effectively destroy all argument against the granting of these new powers to the Filipino people. That point is this: The great merit of the bill, that which constitutes its most apparent justification, is that it offers the only practical means whereby the capacity of the Filipino people for self-government can be tested. If the Filipinos justify themselves, as I know they will, then this issue is ended; if they fail, as I know they will not, then the Congress may return to the present system of absolute American control. The bill is framed with so much regard for the interests of the United States, as well as for that of the Filipinos themselves, that while it permits the Philippine Legislature to initiate and pass all sorts of legislation, it reserves to the Governor General a qualified and to the President an absolute veto power, besides the constitutional right of Congress to annul any of such laws after they have been enacted. In this way the Filipino people can do nothing that will jeopardize the interests of the American people or seriously affect their own should the experiment result in a failure.

THE PREAMBLE.

Mr. Chairman, we have been told, both by the ranking member of the minority on the Committee on Insular Affairs, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and his colleague on the committee [Mr. MILLER], that were it not for this preamble, which, they say, makes the bill a partisan measure, there would have been some possible agreement, at least between the minority and the majority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs, as to most of the legislative provisions of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the spokesmen for the minority members of the Insular Committee have complained of the attitude taken by the majority members of that committee in framing the bill. I submit in all earnestness, Mr. Chairman, that whatever may have been the attitude taken by the Democrats in dealing with the Republicans in the committee room, that should not affect the opinion of the Republicans as to the intrinsic merits of the measure. It may be true that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the other majority members on the committee have shown a partisan spirit in the discussion of the bill in the committee; I do not know. It may be true—and, indeed, there can be no dispute about it—that this is a Democratic measure in the sense that it was introduced by a Democratic Member, reported favorably by a Democratic committee of the House, and indorsed by a Democratic administration. It may be true, as I can see clearly, that the preamble is practically a copy of the Philippine plank of the Democratic platform, and that, therefore, the bill is a redemption of a Democratic campaign pledge. But this does not make it a partisan or a political measure, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] put it, nor should it, for that matter, be opposed by any Republican Member of this House.

Mr. Chairman, this preamble is not a partisan declaration; it is not an expression of a partisan policy. It is the congressional confirmation of all the declarations made by the Chief Executives of the Government of the United States to the world and to the Filipino people from the beginning of the Spanish-American War up to this day regarding the national policy of the American people toward the inhabitants of the islands.

Has anyone forgotten those memorable words of the late President McKinley, that—

Forcible annexation, according to the American code of morals, is criminal aggression.

More recent and more to the point are the declarations made by ex-President Roosevelt and ex-President Taft.

Mr. Taft, in his special report as Secretary of War to the President of the United States in 1907, said:

There are in the Philippines many who wish that the Government shall declare a definite policy in respect to the islands so that they may know what that policy is. I do not see how any more definite policy can be declared than was declared by President McKinley in his instructions to Secretary ROOT for the guidance of the Philippine Commission, which was incorporated into law by the organic act of the Philippine Government, adopted July 1, 1902. That policy is declared to be the extension of self-government to the Philippine Islands by gradual steps from time to time as the people of the islands shall show themselves fit to receive the additional responsibility. * * * It necessarily involves in its ultimate conclusion as the steps toward self-government become greater and greater the ultimate independence of the islands.

Ex-President Roosevelt, in his annual message to the Congress in 1908, declared:

I hope and believe that these steps mark the beginning of a course which will continue till the Filipinos become fit to decide for themselves whether they desire to be an independent nation.

* * * * * * *

I trust that within a generation the time will arrive when the Philippines can decide for themselves whether it is well for them to become independent, or to continue under the protection of a strong and disinterested power, able to guarantee to the islands order at home and protection from foreign invasion.

After such authoritative statements from men who are the accredited spokesmen of your respective parties and at that time were leaders of the Nation as well, can you now, gentlemen of the Republican and Progressive side of the House, turn around and repudiate those declarations by voting against this preamble simply because its language, though substantially the same as your own spokesmen's declarations, is literally copied from the Baltimore platform?

To the Democratic side of the House I have but a little more to say in connection with the preamble. You know that the preamble is but a recital of what has been the Philippine plank of your platform ever since the Philippines came under the Government of the United States, and without frank and open disregard of that pledge you can not vote against that preamble.

Moreover, the titular leader of your party has already informed the Filipino people, not only on behalf of his Democratic administration but in the name of the American Nation, that the policy of this Government toward the islands is what this preamble states it to be. And this message of President Wilson has been delivered to the Filipinos by Gov. Gen. Harrison, the present representative of the United States, on the solemn occasion of his arrival in the Philippines, in the following address:

Citizens of the Philippine Islands, the President of the United States has charged me to deliver to you the following message on behalf of the Government of our country:

"We regard ourselves as trustees acting not for the advantage of the United States, but for the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands.

"Every step we take will be taken with a view to the ultimate independence of the islands and as a preparation for that independence. And we hope to move toward that end as rapidly as the safety and the permanent interests of the islands will permit. After each step taken experience will guide us to the next.

"The administration will take one step at once and will give to the native citizens of the islands a majority in the appointive commission, and thus in the upper as well as in the lower house of the legislature a majority representation will be secured to them.

"We do this in the confident hope and expectation that immediate proof will be given in the action of the commission under the new arrangement of the political capacity of those native citizens who have already come forward to represent and to lead their people in affairs."

This is the message I bear to you from the President of the United States. With his sentiments and with his policy I am in complete accord. Within the scope of my office as Governor General I shall do my utmost to aid in the fulfillment of our promises, confident that we shall thereby hasten the coming of the day of your independence. For my own part I should not have accepted the responsibility of this great office merely for the honor and the power which it confers. My only motive in coming to you is to serve as well as in me lies the people of the Philippine Islands. It is my greatest hope that I may become an instrument in the further spread of democratic government.

To every Democrat government rests only upon the consent of the governed. And we do not maintain that self-government is the peculiar property of our nation or that democratic institutions are the exclusive privileges of our race. On the other hand, we do not believe that we can endow you with the capacity for self-government. That you must have acquired for yourselves. The opportunity of demonstrating it lies before you now in an ever-widening field.

As for ourselves, we confidently expect of you that dignity of bearing and that self-restraint which are the outward evidences of daily increasing national consciousness. In promising you on behalf of the administration immediate control of both branches of your legislature, I remind you, however, that for the present we are responsible to the world for your welfare and your progress. Until your independence is complete we shall demand of you unremitting recognition of our sovereignty

You are now on trial before an international tribunal that is as wide as the world. We who appear before this august court in the light of your advocates are proud of the privilege that has fallen to us, and we do not shun the responsibilities of our rôle, which is without a parallel in history. We shall eagerly await convincing proof that you are capable of establishing a stable government of your own. Such a government may not necessarily denote an entire reproduction of our own institutions, but one which guarantees to its citizens complete security of life, of liberty, and of property. We now invite you to share with us responsibility for such a government here. Every Filipino may best serve his country who serves us in this endeavor, and to that end I call upon every good citizen of these islands, and all who dwell therein, whether of native or foreign birth, for assistance and support.

People of the Philippine Islands, a new era is dawning. We place within your reach the instruments of your redemption. The door of opportunity stands open and under Divine Providence the event is in your own hands.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, that message of President Wilson and the words of Gov. Harrison, with which he delivered to us that message, as well as every prior similar declaration made by former Presidents and Governors General have been received by the Filipino people as the solemn promise made by the American people regarding the future independence of the Philippines. To us there are no Democratic Presidents or Democratic Governors General, no Republican Presidents or Republican Governors General. There are to us but American Presidents and American Governors General, and what they say and do we receive as words and actions of their Nation itself. What a terrible disappointment it would be to the Filipino people if the Congress were now to repudiate those declarations by the defeat of the preamble! And how such a repudiation would shake the faith of the Filipino people in this Nation!

Mr. Chairman, some say that this preamble is worthless because it is not actually a part of the bill, and is therefore without force. If so, then there should not be much opposition to it, for if left in the bill it can do no harm. As for myself I value this preamble for its full worth. It is the one feature of the bill that will permit the Filipino people, even while you still retain your sovereignty over the islands, to feel that they can lift their heads so long bowed in hopeless subjection. It is the one feature of the bill that will permit the Filipino people to look to the days of the morrow with joyous hearts, full of hope and expectation. It is the one feature of the bill that will permit the Filipino people to look at your flag, even while it floats over our public buildings and edifices, as the ensign not of physical force exercised for the permanent domination of a weak people, but as the symbol of the generous purpose of a great country to help a smaller nation that strives to be free to attain its goal, to stand some day soon upon its own feet and move forward thereafter unaided and uncontrolled. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the eyes of the Filipino people are now upon the Congress, and at this particular time upon this House. They live breathless with the horrible suspense caused by the doubt as to what you will do with this bill. On this occasion, momentous as it is to the destinies of that people, they appeal to you not as Democrats, Republicans, or Progressives, but as Americans representing the people that of their own accord have proclaimed themselves as the champions of human freedom. Would you fail them, you who have sacrificed so much in life and in treasure on the altar of this sacred cause? Would you fail them, you whose example, whose influence, whose sympathy have in the past inspired other subject nations and have helped them to attain their freedom? Would you fail them, you who have gone to war in order to liberate Cuba? Would you fail them, you who have encouraged them to overthrow the sovereignty of Spain and accepted their assistance in the Spanish-American War? Would you fail them, after so many of your implied as well as expressed promises of rapid extension to them of self-government and ultimate independence?

Mr. Chairman, the Filipino people have resorted to every means to secure their freedom, and what they have done shows that they deserve to be free. They have shown to the world that they are a people conscious of and longing to secure their national rights. Scores of thousands of their sons have laid down their lives and millions upon millions of their wealth have been destroyed for the sake of that one most precious boon granted to humanity by God Almighty. Failing in this struggle because of their lack of sufficient physical strength, they have tilled the soil, they have searched the mysteries of science, they have learned to appreciate the beauties of art, they have familiarized themselves and complied with their duties as citizens, hoping against hope that what they could not win in battle they might gain through their industry, their culture, and their enlightened and patriotic citizenship.

The Filipino people, Mr. Chairman, beg you to pass this bill. Indeed, they contend that they have given enough proofs of their capacity for self-government to warrant a complete delivery to them of unrestricted powers of government. But since it is said that this bill is all you are now disposed to consider and in view of the fact that they have absolute confidence in the American people, they are willing to accept this bill, and in good faith they acquiesce in the new and more ample trial to which they are to be submitted.

Shall government of the people, by the people, for the people perish from the earth?

Mr. Chairman, sixscore and eighteen years ago your forefathers "brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

This proposition was once challenged as applicable to all men residing within the confines of that Nation, regardless of their color and their race. The world, which had doubted "whether that Nation, or any Nation so conceived and so dedicated," could "long endure," watched with eager eyes the outcome of this issue. Your fathers "gave their lives that that Nation might live." "From these honored dead" the survivors took "increased devotion to that course for which" their noble comrades "gave the last full measure of devotion." They highly resolved "that these dead shall not have died in vain; that that Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Mr. Chairman, twoscore and eleven years have gone by since this sacred resolve was sworn to. To-day the doctrine of the government of the people, by the people, for the people is challenged. Shall you renew that resolve, or shall you demonstrate that those dead have died in vain? [Loud applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. I wonder if you have in your mind's eye the North Pacific Ocean and the lands which bound it and the islands which lie in it? On this side of the ocean lies Central America, the United States, a little strip of British Columbia, and then the long coast line of Alaska, reaching clear over to Russia; and running out from Alaska a little to the southerly are the Aleutian Islands, which reach far toward Japan. We have toward the southern end on this side the Panama Canal, which we will strongly fortify and protect. A little to the west, some 2,500 miles, lie the Hawaiian Islands; a little to the west of those Midway Island and Wake Island, and farther west the island of Guam, and then, farther west, the Philippine Islands. We have to the south of the Hawaiian Islands our share of the Samoan group of islands—the Tutuila and Manua groups. The United States controls, through its own ownership, the great bulk of the strategic positions on this side of the North Pacific Ocean, on the north side of the North Pacific Ocean, and the islands in the North Pacific. On the other side of the Pacific, Russia, with Siberia, and Manchuria, under the control practically of Japan; Korea, under the control of Japan, and China, reaching well to the south. We control to-day to a large extent the strategic positions of the Pacific Ocean lying east of Asia and Japan. The civilization has girdled the world. It started in the Far East and has moved westwardly, taking possession of westerly Asia and northern Africa, of Europe, and, finally, of the American Continents, and as it has reached the Pacific coast on our side it has come in contact again with the civilization of the Far East.

Only a few years ago Japan was opened to the world and to modern civilization. The changes which have been made in Japan, the marvelous growth of her influence, are not equaled by any other nation, I think, in the history of the world.

Close to Japan, lying like a sleeping giant of the world, is China, with her vast territory, with her immense population, and that which was going on in Japan a few years ago is now going on in China. The awakening of China is more marvelous, perhaps, than was the awakening of Japan; and as these great people in China arise to the civilization of our modern days and engage in the manufacture of products, in the production of all which man produces, we will enter upon a series of competitive efforts with the Far East which have never yet been equaled in this world of ours.

The great population of China, we say, shall not be permitted to come to our shores. At the same time we say that China shall not be permitted to shut out our people or our goods. Such a position as we take perhaps can not be abandoned by our people, but it can never be enforced in the long run without the power to enforce it. When China is awakened and the tendency comes which always comes to an awakening country, thickly populated, going out into the world either with her own people or with the production of goods made by her people, we will have a conflict on our hands which will last for many years, possibly for many centuries. And we who are now legislating, if we do not bear in mind the possibilities not merely of to-day or to-morrow or of 100 years from now—we who are legislating now, who do not bear in mind the possibilities of hundreds of years from now and the inevitable conflict, commercial or otherwise, which we will meet in the Far East, have forgotten the principles which ought primarily to actuate us. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have no doubt that it is as certain as that the sun will rise to-morrow morning that a conflict will come between the Far East and the Far West across the Pacific Ocean. All of which has taken place in the world during the history of the human race up to now teaches us that the avoidance of this conflict is impossible. I hope that it may only be a commercial conflict; I hope that the war may not come; I hope that there will be no conflict of arms. But I have little faith that in this world of ours people and races are able to meet in competition for a long period of time without an armed conflict. A fight for commercial supremacy in the end leads to a fight with arms, because that is the final arbiter between nations.

We command the Pacific Ocean to-day with the land that we have on this side, with the islands which we possess in the sea, and with the Philippines on the other side. Will we surrender our command? I say no; never. [Applause on the Republican side.] If we should let the Philippine Islands go to-day without a string tied to them they would belong to some other country inside of 10 years. But if they could keep their independence for 25 or 50 or even 100 years, in the end they would be used against us instead of in our favor in this inevitable conflict between competing races. I am opposed to giving the Philippine Islands independence.

Mr. QUEZON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. It is one of the characteristics of my friend from the Philippine Islands that he can not sit still while somebody is discussing the Philippine question. I do not blame him, but I hope he will wait until I get through. I may say something to console him before I am through. I do not believe that we should grant independence to the Philippine Islands. I do not believe that we ought to grant independence with a string tied to it. I had rather grant them absolute independence than to grant independence with a string tied to it, as suggested by the gentleman from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. QUEZON. I did not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he did not, but he did in the speech he just made. I do not believe that the example we are having in Mexico is any inducement to extend, either directly or indirectly, the so-called Monroe doctrine, or anything like it, to the Philippine Islands. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We are having trouble enough now about a country where we say we can not afford to let another nation enter; we are having trouble enough now in Mexico, and with the other Republics to the south, without engaging in any more enterprises of that kind.

Who would propose on the part of the Philippines that they be given their independence without reserving a naval station to us? I am not sure that I am in favor of reserving any naval station. I think that if they are to go, let them go and let Japan and China take them, or Germany or England, as is inevitable, and then we will know what we have got to fight. Who would propose to-day that we let Japan have a naval station in Mexico? Who to-day in our country would assent to a proposition, if England should propose it, to transfer British Columbia to Japan? Would we consent to it? We would go to war in a minute to prevent it. Why? Because we would be opposed to letting Japan or China have a base for supplies on this side of the Pacific Ocean. Why? Because when it comes to that we know that it would hurt us in the conflict that we know will come. Now, we have the Philippine Islands. They came to us not by our taking away their independence. We did not seize them. We took them from Spain. I think that in justice to our own country and to those who will come after us it is our duty, first, to keep the Philippines under the flag of the United States, and, second, to make them our friends. It would be no great advantage to the United States to own the Philippine Islands or to have them a part of us in time of war if they were unfriendly to us. It is our business not only to keep them under our flag but to make them want to stay under our flag. I do not think that any gentleman can say, as I have heard said here, that this is an impossibility. Not at all. Most of the people who get under the American flag want to stay there. If we deal with the Filipino people rightly, they will want to stay here. I have heard debate here about whether the Filipinos are capable of self-government or incapable of self-government. I assume, for the purpose of argument at least, that they are capable of self-government. I am in favor of giving to the Filipino people the broadest liberty of self-government, retaining them under the American flag. [Applause on the Republican side.] The objection I have to the pending bill, in part, is that it has too many restrictions in it. If others do not offer amendments to remove those restrictions, I expect to offer a number of amendments to remove the restrictions upon the Philippine Legislature; and for this reason: If we keep them, we ought to give them the widest liberty of action in all their local affairs.

If we have determined or do determine upon eventual independence, we ought then to try to give them the widest liberty now and see whether they abuse it; and all these restrictions, which we would not impose upon a Territory of our own country, which we nowhere endeavor to impose upon the States of our country, I think ought to be wiped out. I think we ought to give those people a chance to see whether they can carry on their own local affairs, make them friends of the United States, so that in the future when these conflicts will arise we will have control of this side of the Pacific Ocean and we will have warm, devoted, patriotic American friends and citizens in the Philippine Islands on the other side of the Pacific Ocean, so that this country and our race may remain supreme on the fighting ground of the future, the Pacific Ocean. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield back whatever time I may have remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I shall avail myself of the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD, and I yield back the balance of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KIRKPATRICK].

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, briefly stated, the Philippine Archipelago embraces within its range over 3,000 separate and distinct islands, with an area of land amounting to 115,000 square miles, an area more than twice as large as that of the State of Iowa.

None of these islands is wholly without inhabitants after the similitude of this particular race of people. They are not of that size and stature that characterizes the Anglo-Saxon or the North American Indian; hence by some they are denominated as "little brown men."

In the incipiency of our war with Spain it was announced by President McKinley that the contest would not be one of conquest or territorial aggrandizement, and later he proclaimed that in the event of occupation of the Philippine Islands the process of benevolent assimilation would soon add greatly to the uplift of the people inhabiting those islands, thus insuring a better life, higher ideals, and greater civilization; yet within 90 days after occupancy of the islands there were over 400 American saloons in the city of Manila.

From a selfish standpoint I would favor the retention of these islands, following the advice of the old lady to her husband on his leaving for the West to buy land, "Git a plenty while you're a gittin, says I." Again, there are others moving in the world powers who have longing eyes and designing motives in regard to these possessions, and if at any time we should become involved in a war they would not, in my judgment, hesitate to take advantage of the situation, as has already been demonstrated since the European War began. In this connection, I would not thrust a shaft nor hurl a javelin at Japan without calling attention to the action of France in placing Maximilian on the throne of Mexico, a thing that she would not have dared to do had our hands been free from an internal war of our own.

If the crisis in Europe is to result in changing the map of that continent, I think I will defer the purchase of a map until such time as we may be able to get a later issue or a revised edition.

But let us return to a discussion of the bill now being considered by the Congress. We captured Cuba, and should have kept it. We could have used it in our business, but we returned it to ungrateful occupants. In the settlement and adjustment of our difficulties with Spain, I would have exercised the same power and dominion over that country that Germany did over France at the end of the Franco-Prussian War, and in addition thereto an indemnity of $10 000 should have been paid to the family of each of our brave boys who went down in the Maine.

The Philippines are, as it were, our wards, and in the granting of autonomy to these people we should continue to exercise such power and influence over the islands as will protect and perpetuate the very modest desires of these people, and to this end let us extend a helping hand such as will insure to them a happy and prosperous name in the history of the nations of the world.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to make the inquiry as to whether the gentlemen who are asking to extend their remarks in the RECORD are asking to extend remarks on this bill or upon another matter?

Mr. OGLESBY. On this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the rule provides that all gentlemen may print on this subject whether they speak or not.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the Representative from the Philippines, and also to the distinguished leader of the minority, Mr. MANN, of Illinois. I am in sympathy with the well-spoken words of the Philippine Representative, who pleads for the fulfillment of promises repeatedly made to the Filipinos, whose hearts yearn for national liberty and the right to control their own affairs. I am out of accord with the utterances of the minority leader, who would perpetuate conditions by which national freedom to this people shall be delayed and the expensive burden upon our people shall be continued. I am heartily in favor of the passage of this bill. The Members on this side of the aisle will not forget the repeated declarations of the Democratic Party in its several national platforms in favor of Philippine independence and the surrender of control of their own affairs to those people. I have heard a great deal of discussion here about the literacy and illiteracy of the people of the Philippine Islands. I care not for that. I care little for that discussion, but more that justice be done, and that they be not longer held in national bondage by this great liberty-loving Republic of ours, which has proclaimed so long to all the world the right of a people to be free and to govern themselves.

The American people are more interested in the doctrine of freedom and independence and liberty of a people whose hearts hunger for the right to govern their own affairs than it is in the percentage of literacy or illiteracy of its population. The literacy of this people is far greater than that of our southern Republic, and yet we are not seeking to extend our control over this Republic that lies in turmoil and trouble to our south. Some have talked about having taken the Philippines from Spain. We purchased from Spain a title about to be lost by assuming $20 000 000 of indebtedness that she was unable to pay at the end of the Spanish War, and we assumed the payment of that $20,000,000 indebtedness and took this title to the Philippines that Spain had already about lost. For 400 years Spain had ruled with an iron hand those people, who struggled for liberty and had already acquired or were about to acquire full control of their own affairs, when we, without any conception that we would ever go into the Orient and acquire foreign territory, traded the right to pay $20,000,000 of indebtedness growing out of Cuban conditions in order to assume control in the far Orient. It had never been the policy and desire of this country that we should own colonies, especially in another hemisphere. The Democratic Party that had believed in the utterances of Thomas Jefferson has never believed that any people were good enough to control and rule any other people without their consent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We ought not to be in the Orient for purposes of conquest or of government over an alien race, and I have no patience and no sympathy with the idea that we should establish dominion over a country in the Orient, when we continually assert the Monroe doctrine and proclaim the thought that no European power shall extend dominion in the Western Hemisphere. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have no sympathy with the playing upon the prejudices of any people and predicting and inviting war with either a people in the Orient or anywhere else on the face of the earth. On this day we pray for the time when militarism shall end and when the doctrine of peace and friendship shall be proclaimed in all the world. I have no sympathy with great leaders who hold up before us at all times the idea that war, endless, continual, everlasting war, shall be the heritage of this and all other countries for all time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe it is in the power of this Government to advance a nobler and a better thought—that of peace on earth and friendship between all nations. We pay tribute to Japan and to her leaps to intelligence and power. Why not also give tribute to these splendid people who are a thousand miles away from Japan and six or eight thousand miles away from us, whose literacy is greater than the literacy of Mexico, greater than the literacy of Spain when it dominated these Filipinos, and greater than the literacy of hundreds of people who control their own affairs. They are leaping to the front. Why not extend to them their heart's desire to govern themselves? Let them come into their own; let us surrender the dominion acquired in order that they may assume their rightful control over their own affairs, and withdraw our armies from their midst and stop the enormous expense to the American people of sustaining a large standing army in a foreign country.

Thomas Jefferson uttered the thought and many repeated the idea of the acquisition of Cuba, so as to round off our own country and thus better safeguard our rights in our part of the world, making more secure the domination by us of the Panama Canal, built at so large a cost, in our desire to connect two great oceans and to shorten distance for trade purposes. A hundred times better to have acquired Cuba, that lay in the Atlantic so near our border, than to have acquired and now try to perpetuate dominion over these islands in the far-away waters of the Pacific Ocean.

The American people gave to the world their plighted faith that they would not acquire Cuba for permanent occupation and sovereignty, and in its declaration of war against Spain, referring to Cuba, declared:

> That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people. (Apr. 20, 1898.)

We kept this promise with reference to Cuba. If willing to let Cuba be free to govern herself, why should we be less generous and just to the Philippines? Should not Democrats at least attempt to keep faith with its party promises? The last national declaration of the Democratic Party, uttered at Baltimore, reads as follows:

> We reaffirm the position thrice announced by the Democracy in national convention assembled against a policy of imperialism and colonial exploitation in the Philippines or elsewhere. We condemn the experiment of imperialism as an inexcusable blunder, which has involved us in enormous expenses, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandonment of the fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases.

Four times in its national platform declarations the Democratic Party has said that the Filipinos should have their independence. Admiral Dewey years ago declared that the Filipinos were more intelligent than the Cubans, and, if true, it is not a question of education but a question of right and justice to the Filipinos and of justice and relief to the American people.

Why not pass this bill, a moderate measure, but a positive declaration, to the end that these people shall have their desire when they shall evidence to the people of the United States that they have established a stable government. Let us separate ourselves from continued domination of this far-away country, and we will be the better able to follow out the immortal doctrine laid down and preached by Thomas Jefferson, who declared that the settled policy of our people should be peace and friendship with all nations and entangling alliances with none. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I will.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. This is the first time that the Democratic Party has been in full control of the Government since these islands were acquired——

Mr. DICKINSON. And the first time it has had any opportunity to keep its plighted word given to the world about the Filipinos.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. With that opportunity before you, why do you not go ahead now and free these islands and set up an independent government there? You may not have a chance again for a long time.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to go the full limit; and I believe, regardless of the fact that there are disturbances to the south of us, regardless of the fact that there is war in Europe, regardless of the growth of any people anywhere, the United States of America is strong enough to declare to-day their purpose for complete independence for these people. But the Republican side of the House so long has resisted the idea of giving at an early or at any date full and complete independence to the Philippines that out of this conflict there has arisen this moderate bill that every man ought to be willing to give his cordial support to. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to my colleague on the Insular Affairs Committee [Mr. GOULDEN].

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, presided over by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], and to whom credit is due for his untiring efforts in framing this bill, I am in entire accord with the measure.

The administrative features of the bill were satisfactory in the main to all the members of the committee. The preamble, or introduction, which is in harmony with the platform adopted at the Baltimore convention and meets the approbation of the best sentiment of the people of the United States, caused a division in the committee on political lines.

The platform of the Republican Party adopted at Chicago in 1912 means nothing, as it contains no specific declaration on the subject. On the other hand, the Democratic position, as expressed at Baltimore, is clear and explicit. Briefly, it reads as follows:

> We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

The preamble in the bill is as follows:

> Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and
>
> Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and
> Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without, in the meantime, impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence.

Certainly there can be no misunderstanding, as the declaration is as clear as the noonday sun, so that he who runs may read and understand.

On the question of ultimate independence of the Philippines, as early as it can safely be done, and the sooner the better for both countries, there is no division of opinion among Democrats. The members of that party on the committee differ somewhat as to the probable time this can be done safely and advantageously to the 8,000,000 people of the islands.

Personally I am in perfect accord with the President in believing that the time has not arrived to do this, no matter how desirable it might seem to be.

The changes in the proposed new organic law, while not radical, are in the interest of both countries, and will prove of incalculable advantage to the Filipinos, enabling them to demonstrate their ability to govern themselves. It is satisfactory to them, as voiced by 3 leading Provinces and 40 municipalities; by the able representatives in Congress, Commissioners QUEZON and EARNSHAW; by Gov. Gen. Harrison, a former distinguished Member of the House; by the majority party there; and the clergy in the islands. The attitude of these men, familiar with conditions there and knowing the sentiment of the people, should induce the Congress to promptly pass this wise beneficial legislation.

The principal changes in the proposed law are to define citizenship substantially in accordance with existing law, the only change being that the Philippine Legislature is authorized to confer the right of citizenship upon citizens of the United States residing in the islands. Places upon the Philippine Government the responsibility for all expenses contracted by that government on its own account. Declares that the statute laws of the United States hereafter enacted shall not apply to the Philippines except where expressly so provided. Confers upon the Philippine Legislature authority to amend or repeal any law continued in force by this bill, and specifically extends this power to all laws relating to revenue and taxation in effect in the Philippines subject to certain limitations. Confers the legislative power now exercised by the Philippine Legislature and the Philippine Commission upon the legislature authorized in this bill. Provides that the trade relations between the islands and the United States shall continue to be governed exclusively by laws enacted by the Congress of the United States. Establishes a Philippine Legislature, to consist of two houses, to be known as the senate and the house of representatives, respectively, and vests all legislative authority in them, except as otherwise specified. Provides that the members of the senate shall be elected for terms of four years, and that each senate district shall have the right to elect two senators. Defines the qualifications of those who shall vote for senators and representatives and for all other elective officers.

It gives the people of the islands a much larger measure of home rule and must prove much more satisfactory to both countries. The best sentiment of the business men having money invested in the islands is favorable to this bill.

The leading newspapers of the country are favorable to it, to quote extracts from the New York World and the Evening Post among the many at hand. The former in a recent issue said:

> This pledge is faithfully observed in the bill now reported to Congress by Chairman JONES of the Insular Affairs Committee. It asserts a purpose to recognize Philippine independence when a stable government has been established; and in providing a Philippine Legislature which will be elective for both branches and which will have broad powers, subject to certain restrictions in tariff and currency and land legislation and to the veto of the Washington Government, the way is opened for the Filipinos to prove their capacity to establish a stable government.
> Through such an act we shall have an end of the twaddling and deceiving policy which holds out to the Filipinos a promise of independence when they are fit for it and then denies them a man's chance to prove their fitness.

[From the Evening Post, New York, an old and independent newspaper.]

> The Jones bill, reported Saturday, not merely follows the Democratic pledge that independence be granted the Philippines as soon as a stable government could be established in the islands, but it looks to effective steps to bring about conditions that will permit the severance of political relations with the United States. The substitution for the commission of a popularly elected Senate follows naturally the action of the administration last fall in giving the Filipinos a majority in the upper appointed body. The new bicameral legislature, with full powers of legislation except as regards tariff, currency, and public lands and the restriction of a congressional veto, will give the islanders full room to demonstrate their governmental capacity. The suffrage is also enlarged. Under Gov. Gen. Harrison, and with the admirable order that has characterized the Filipinos in the recent uncertain months, the development of a stable government should be rapid. Friends of the Philippines, as well as advocates of caution, may be glad that the eight-year date for independence proposed in the first Jones bill has been dropped.

The minority report, signed by 5 of the 7 Republican members of the committee, dissents from the unanimous report of the majority, consisting of 14 members. Its objections are confined almost entirely to the declarations, which are termed politics for the want of a better name. Our friends on the other side of this Chamber do not seem to be especially in love with the platform adopted at Baltimore, and always object to its being carried out by the Democratic Party in fulfillment of its pledges; but that party will assume all responsibility, as the people in 1912 decided it should do. The Democrats of this Congress, appreciating the trust placed in them by the people, will pass this measure, which will inure to the benefit of the Philippines and the American Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, after the eloquent and earnest plea of the gentleman from the Philippines for the right of his people to be free, everything that comes after in this debate is anticlimax. He spoke with a comprehension and with a feeling which perhaps no other Member of this House can possibly have. And it is a curious criticism of the present state of the public mind in this country that the representative of a people who are not free, but who would like to be, has to appeal to the representatives of a country which boasts of its freedom to be given the same privilege. That is a reflection upon us and upon this Congress; and I hope that at the first opportunity which may hereafter arise the step toward such a goal that we are now taking may be followed by others and this glorious work completed.

Mr. Chairman, when the debate on this bill closed last Monday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] had just concluded an entertaining speech against it. He never fails—at least, I have never known him to fail—to make an entertaining speech, but on that occasion he fairly surpassed himself. His account of the settling of the American Colonies was scholarly, entertaining, and instructive, but, really, so far as I was able to judge, shed no particular light on the Philippine problem.

I was charmed with the grace and skill with which he recalled those stirring days at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, the sea battle at Manila, and the heroic behavior of our Army and Navy. But I have always thought that courage in American soldiers and sailors might be taken for granted. I thought so in 1898, and I could never see the reason for the hysteria and bragging at that time. It was all brought back to me pleasantly and reminiscently by the gentleman's speech. I realized again the whole situation as it was in April and May, 1898, with its confusing mixture of sincerity and humbuggery, bathos, fustian and brag, heroes and near heroes, and skilled politicians who played it up for personal gain. The one new element introduced by the gentleman from Ohio was the self-given certificate of virtue and integrity and the note of thankfulness that we Americans are not like other men.

It was a real pleasure to meet these old acquaintances again, and, notwithstanding their new dress, they were easily recognized.

As a Democrat I am glad to know that the distinguished gentleman approves Thomas Jefferson, although he seemed to be specially pleased only with that great man's departure from the strict letter of the Constitution when the Louisiana Territory was bought. That, however, is not surprising when we remember that he is from a State that has a constitution which is persistently disregarded.

He also indorses the Declaration of Independence—for home use—but does not want its principles applied in the Philippines. Government only with the consent of the governed sounds well in Ohio, but is not to be thought of in the Philippines.

The gentleman, by the way, was also distressed over the illiteracy in the Philippine Islands, and that led to an unpleasant controversy between him and one or two other Members of the House, which I am pleased to say has now been put away, and the sun shines once more.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment just at that point?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No, sir. If I shall have concluded at the time the gavel falls, I will be happy to yield to the gentleman for any question he wants to ask.

The gentleman now seems to be alarmed, as I was saying, at illiteracy in the Philippines. But the party of which he is such an ornament was not haunted by that fear nor its partisan purpose halted 45 years ago when millions of unlettered blacks were given control of the Southern States. As if to insure the supremacy of the illiterate and unfit at that time, the whites were disfranchised just when the blacks were enfranchised.

But, Mr. Chairman, that has nothing to do with this bill or the effort to give the Filipinos the independence which the true American spirit always encourages people to demand.

The gentleman from Ohio says that in the consideration of this bill we should give attention to it from the point of view of Philippine interests, and only after that consider American interests. I hope the time will soon come when all Philippine legislation will be done in Manila; but until that time does come I can not divest my mind of the idea that it is our duty to keep always before us the possible influence on American affairs of every legislative act.

Mr. Chairman, let me make my position perfectly clear. I am interested in the Filipinos, and I want them to have independence and justice, but I am more interested in my own people. The problem has always been not what we should do with the Filipinos, but what they will do with us.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is quite impossible.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. FESS. The reference to my statement that the gentleman made, that my only concern was for the Filipino people must be modified——

Mr. SLAYDEN. In giving them absolute independence, in making the divorce as complete as possible, we will be doing a great service to our own people.

In giving them absolute independence, in making the divorce as complete as possible, we will be doing a great service to our own people.

This bill is the first tardy step in the redemption of a pledge repeatedly made to release the people of the Philippine Islands from any sort of political obligation to the Government of the United States. It begins the work of breaking a bond which ought never, speaking my humble judgment, to have been forged.

There has hardly been a day since Dewey sailed into Manila Bay in 1898 that our presence in the Philippines has not been unwelcome. We are an alien people, and the Filipinos regard us as interlopers. They view us as we would them if the situation were reversed.

Neither party has ever declared for a perpetual political association with the islands, and the Democratic Party has persistently, in every convention since 1900, inclusive, frankly stated its sympathy with the desires of the Filipinos for absolute independence. Many of the friends of Philippine independence have believed there should be a gradual concession in that direction which would ultimately transfer to the people of the islands a complete and unhampered control of their own affairs. This end is what I have hoped for and always worked for, but I have never wavered in the belief that it should be granted without delay or conditions except, possibly, an arrangement with certain great powers for their neutralization. In a speech which I delivered in this House on the 15th of February, 1905, I put forward the suggestion of neutrality, basing my remarks on an argument made by Erving Winslow, of Boston, before the Thirteenth International Peace Congress in that city in 1904. So far as I am advised Mr. Winslow was the first person in the country to propose such a settlement of the Philippine question. Other gentlemen have since pressed the neutrality idea with zeal and persistence, and my colleague, Mr. BURGESS, is entitled to much credit for his earnest work in behalf of the island people and neutralization.

Let me briefly review the platform utterances of the two great American parties on this question. In 1900 the Kansas City Democratic platform said:

> We condemn and denounce the Philippine policy of the present administration. It has involved the Republic in unnecessary war, sacrificed the lives of many of our noblest sons, and placed the United States, previously known and applauded throughout the world as the champion of freedom, in the false and un-American position of crushing with military force the efforts of our former allies to achieve liberty and self-government.

In the same year the Republican platform, after a sort of meaningless, high sounding rodomontade, made this mild pledge to the Filipinos:

> The largest measure of self-government consistent with their welfare and our duties shall be secured them by law.

We were to judge of what was needed for them. The Philippine people asked for bread and were mocked with that stone.

The Democratic platform in 1904 said:

> It is our duty to make that promise—
>
> The promise of freedom—
> now, and upon suitable guaranties of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident there at the time of our withdrawal set the Filipino people upon their feet, free and independent, to work out their own destiny.

The Republican platform of that year promised nothing to the Philippines and was content with saying that they had been useful as a base from which to send relief to the legations in Peking, which had been assaulted by the Boxer revolutionists.

In 1908 the Democrats again condemned the experiment in imperialism and colonial enterprises and favored a declaration by the Government for Filipino independence and expressed a desire to have the islands neutralized.

The Republican platform of that year boasted of the achievements of the party and claimed that it was advancing the people of the islands to "an ever-increasing home rule." That was a very mild draft for people who were thirsting for liberty.

The Democratic platform of 1912 reaffirmed the declarations of the platforms of 1900, 1904, and 1908 on the Philippine question, except that it declared it to be the duty of this Government to guarantee the independence of the Philippines until—

The neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

The Republican platform of 1912 had on this question one declaration with which I am in hearty accord. It said:

Our duty toward the Filipino people is a national obligation which should remain entirely free from partisan politics.

That is a sane and patriotic, a wise and noble position, and I hope all the Republicans in this Congress will be guided by it and vote their honest sentiments on this bill. I believe that if this question had never been associated with partisan politics an overwhelming majority of both parties would long ago have voted for a resolution like this, perhaps for one much more advanced. It would have resulted in legislation highly gratifying to the Filipinos and good for our own people.

Mr. Chairman, I support this measure as an act of justice to the Philippines and because it offers relief to this Government from expensive and embarrassing obligations which should never have been assumed and which should be put away as quickly as possible.

In undertaking to maintain government over an unwilling, alien people we violate a fundamental of our own country. The Filipinos have never consented to our control, and they never will do so. That is reason enough for the political divorce this bill proposes. But we will make our own position in relation to other countries stronger by withdrawing from the Philippines. They contribute nothing to our security; they are a place to defend, where successful defense is almost impossible, and thus are a source of weakness.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to, but have only a minute and a half left.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And the gentleman has promised me, too.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum has been made. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Only 26 Members are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 276 Members, a quorum, answered to their names; and he presented the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is a little embarrassing to realize that the only way in which I can possibly get such an audience is to have them called in, as this has been.

Mr. Chairman, I was addressing myself to the thought that an alien government is never a happy or satisfactory government for the people on whom it is enforced. Enforced outside government over people of a different race, language, and religion is rarely, if ever, satisfactory. Examples of this fact are brought to our attention from time to time, and in a way we can not afford to ignore. A great war is now raging in Europe; a war with armies so huge that the forces of Xerxes, which so impressed us in our youth, appear an insignificant mob; a war which in its evil economic influences threatens to surpass in six months the destruction done in the Thirty Years War or that of the Napoleonic era, from which Europe did not fully recover in all the years between Waterloo and the Crimea.

This unparalleled conflict is largely the outgrowth of a struggle between Slav and Teuton in that turbulent section of Europe generally referred to as the Balkans. No doubt either Franz Josef of Austria or Wilhelm of Germany could give those people a government which, in all essentials but one, would be as good as they can give themselves. That one essential is the quality of self-government. The Slav does not want a Teuton overlord any more than the Teuton would want a Slav executive. Race and language are different, and each has tremendously developed all the prejudices and hopes of its own people—prejudices and hopes that are fundamental, that spring from the natures of the two peoples.

Statesmen in Europe who can see through and beyond the smoke of battle are already considering what steps should be taken to insure continued peace when peace shall come again. With wonderful unanimity the statesmen of all countries that are not actually battling for the possession of the territory and sovereignty of other people are agreed that when the map of Europe comes to be redrawn the boundaries must run, if peace is to continue, along racial lines. Slav should have Slav government and Teutons a Teutonic government. In a word, if they are to be content, the people who are to be governed must be consulted and their wishes respected.

If that doctrine is sound in Europe, why is it not sound in Asia and America? I think it is, and I believe that we should apply it in the Philippines and that the government of the Filipinos should be conducted by themselves.

Let me say again, Mr. Chairman, that I support this bill because it is right, because the Filipino people want it, and because I am thoroughly convinced that it will be best for our own people. We can not continue to force government on an unwilling people without cultivating contempt for the great principles on which our Republic is founded. I have not forgotten that one of our own officials in the Philippines referred to the Declaration of Independence as a "damned inflammable document." It is an inflammable document, and I am glad of it. It helped to light and has kept burning the fires of liberty throughout the world for nearly 140 years. What American would have it otherwise? [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, from that eventful morning when the thunder of Dewey's cannon rolled away over Manila Bay and reverberated in the mountains of Luzon, sounding the death knell of Spanish sovereignty over that island kingdom, and as the American flag floated out on the breeze from the walls of the citadel where for 400 years the banner of Castile had been the emblem of power, the people of our country have had an unexpected but no less great responsibility placed upon them.

This responsibility might have been shirked. Dewey could have sailed away with his fleet after the battle, leaving the people of those islands to their fate. Some other nation might now be exercising sovereignty over them. However, in my judgment, the hand of Him who controls the destiny of men and of nations pointed the way, and by a series of events placed the millions of people in the Philippines in our hands. Have we as the guardians of these people proved ourselves worthy of the trust? Let the world pass judgment upon our work. In discussing matters pertaining to the duties we have to perform in the exercise of our sovereignty over these people, how pitiable to hear men in this body belittle our work and decry our motives. How idle for our Democratic brethren to talk about their recent and past political platforms in relation to this matter. Oh, that in this matter we might rise to the heights of real statesmanship, that prejudice could be laid aside, that the nobility of purpose and the unselfishness of the motive of the great Republic might be understood, at least by our own citizens. How regrettable are such statements as those made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] the other day when in discussing this bill he said, among other things:

I say that this whole Philippine enterprise is one of the most disgraceful chapters in the history of the United States. Why, this Philippine history is a thing that every decent American ought to try to forget.

He further said in his speech, giving as his authority ex-Speaker Reed, that we bought them for $2 a head. I say such statements are regrettable, and I do not think they set forth the true sentiment of the American people. I differ from my friend from Ohio and all persons who hold such views. I do not think the taking over of the Philippines by our Government marks a disgraceful chapter in our history; but, on the other hand, when the work is complete, which we have undertaken for the Philippine people, it will conclude not only the most glorious chapter in the history of our country but the most glorious and unselfish chapter in the history of any nation. Is there an American who does not feel some pride in the work of his country in the Philippines, mighty as our country is; able, as Mr. QUEZON well said, "to dominate his country with physical force," and misuse his people, instead of aiding them in their preparation for self-government and liberty?

It is true that after we had vanquished Spain, the mother country, we paid her $20,000,000 to relinquish all of her claims, not only in the property in the Philippine Islands but to sovereignty in every sense. Did we buy the Philippine people as chattels? No; but we did pay to the mother country a sum in full consideration for every claim to the people and property of the islands. Why? We were not bound to do so. Was it wise? Yes, in my judgment; for when the time comes for the Philippine people to unfurl their flag as a nation they will in truth and fact be free. All claims were paid by the unselfish citizenship of the great free Republic of the western world. We paid the price. When the flag of our country, the emblem of liberty, was unfurled in those islands, and as the morning sun kissed its beautiful folds a new day dawned in that far-away land; the night of ignorance and superstition which had obscured the light of liberty was dispelled, and the Philippine people awakened to the fact that the road to freedom and self-government was opened up to them. It was hard for them at first to grasp our true purpose, but we have demonstrated to them that it was not to take them by the throat and rob them, but it was our purpose, as we loved liberty, to take them by the hand and lead them step by step up the pathway of civilization and teach them self-government until such time as they were fitted to walk alone in the march of the nations of earth. How have we proceeded in this work? In the way some critics for political buncombe would have the world believe? Oh, no. Have we taxed the people for our benefit? No; but, on the other hand, we have poured our treasure into the work; and while it may be true that a few individuals have been unfaithful to their trust in this work, it is always so, and all such should be summarily punished; but as a Nation we have been doing an unselfish work, and one that we could relinquish at any time and escape responsibility if we did not have the future welfare of these people at heart. Thus far, step by step, we have led them on in their efforts, giving them a voice in the control of their municipal affairs as fast as it seemed wise. The bill under consideration is only a part of the plan outlined in the beginning and is a long step forward, giving them practical self-government under our protection, and is the proper thing to do.

The bill as reported from the committee, in my judgment, is not perfect and should be amended; but in the discussion of the bill and in the work to follow I do not think it is in keeping with the exalted purpose of our policy to express too great a readiness, either by preamble to this bill or otherwise, to shake the dust from our feet and leave the Philippine people to shift for themselves. Why this haste to declare we are going to let them go and shift for themselves? Let us rather give them the right to self-government under our protection, aiding them in every way we can, and when they have demonstrated their ability to conduct a government such as we hope to see them enjoy, free representative government, and they then petition for the relinquishment of our sovereignty over them, we will gladly withdraw, as we did in Cuba, taking down our flag and, as we behold theirs flung to the breeze, join with them in rejoicing that a new nation is launched in that far-off clime. But let us remember that in order to have and enjoy self-government such as our Republic, the people must have general intelligence and education relating to the matters of government; not just a few of them, such as we see in our sister Republic in Mexico. Such a government is a farce when spoken of as a Republic. Such a people should be ruled by a monarch. We wish to see the Philippine people have a real Republic, and in order to have that the masses should be educated; and it is inconceivable that at this time, after only a few years of freedom, that the masses of the people could have the education and experience to justify us in saying that they are fitted for the character of self-government we, as free men, would desire to see established. As an American, loving liberty and despising despotism, abhorring the political teachings of royal blood and class distinction, I cheerfully join in the enactment of any legislation that will tend to better the condition, make happier the hearts, and inspire the souls of the Philippine people with an ambition to press forward to the goal of self-government under the guiding and protecting hand of the great American Republic.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT].

[Mr. DAVENPORT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TOWNER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, it is just 13 years to-day since I returned from the Philippine Islands to my home at San Francisco. At that time the Philippine insurrection had just been quelled and the first shipload of American schoolteachers had landed at Manila. Military rule was giving way to civil administration. In the following long session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, in 1902, the Philippine civil-government bill was enacted into law.

Since then, under the policies and administrations of the Republican Party, we have affected to render civil control independent of and superior to the military power, and have abolished an inquisitorial system of criminal investigation and secured for the humblest citizen charged with crime the advantage of a fair and speedy trial.

We have cleared the southern seas of the archipelago of piracy and everywhere suppressed brigandage and outlawry and made life and property secure throughout all the civilized parts of the islands.

We have suppressed intertribal strife among the uncivilized peoples and inspired in them a desire to pursue the arts of peace.

We have built schoolhouses and colleges throughout the Philippine Islands and kept among the Filipino people schoolteachers, who have taught the children to read and write.

We have done more in a dozen years to spread a common language among the Filipino people than was accomplished in all preceding centuries.

We have built hospitals for the sick and spread throughout the islands the principles of modern sanitation. We have eradicated smallpox, suppressed Asiatic cholera and bubonic plague, and prevented the scourge of beri-beri.

We have encouraged intercourse with the outside world by building in Manila Harbor the finest docks in the Orient and one of the most extensive breakwaters in the world, by lighting the coasts, and by improving all other Philippine harbors.

We have encouraged interisland communication by providing new routes of communication, new lines of steamships, new railways, new telegraph and telephone lines, and new roads and bridges.

We have constructed great public works and undertaken important irrigation projects, driven artesian wells, built market places, and instituted many other permanent improvements.

We have encouraged every native industry and implanted new industries. We have more than doubled the commerce of the archipelago. We have provided new markets for Filipino products and given the islands the advantage of free trade with the home country.

We have increased the demand for labor and more than doubled the wages of labor and have raised the standard of living.

We have replaced a base and fluctuating currency, which made trade a gamble, with a stable and uniform system.

We have settled the agrarian difficulties connected with the friar lands, which for more than a quarter of a century were a constant source of irritation and controversy throughout the archipelago. We have made the public domain available for settlement by the common people and have afforded means of acquiring and securing land titles at little cost.

We have destroyed a system of taxation which imposed its burden upon the poor and weak, and substituted therefor an adequate system of revenue, distributing its burden so as to require of every Filipino only his fair share.

We have given the Filipino people complete autonomy in their municipal governments and a majority of direction in the provincial governments and a large and increasing share in the central government. We have provided a Philippine Assembly, composed wholly of duly elected native members, coequal in power with the Philippine Commission in all legislative matters. We have permitted the Filipinos to share in the composition of the Philippine Commission, in all of the courts, and in all of the executive departments. We have led them steadily in the way of self-government, and given them meanwhile honest and efficient administration.

We have economically collected the revenues of the islands and honestly expended every cent thereof for the mental, moral, and material development of the Filipino people.

Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to say that this has all been accomplished out of the revenues of the Philippine Islands. While thousands of our countrymen may be under the false impression that the islands have been a great financial burden to us, that is not the case. Their possession has probably added somewhat to the cost of our military and naval establishments, but after our experience of unpreparedness in the Spanish-American War the American people undoubtedly would have demanded an increase of the Army and the Navy even if we had not come into possession of the Philippine Archipelago. But I believe every American must feel proud of what we have accomplished in the Philippines. It is a record of achievement that any political party might well be proud of; it is a record of achievement in colonial administration that has probably never been equaled at any time in the history of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, to-day the Democratic Party is at the helm in this country. It seems to me our Democratic friends are laboring under the fatuous belief that a Filipino republic can be founded by legislative fiat. Otherwise we probably would not now be considering a bill whose preamble, in my judgment, is fraught with evil and danger. It is a well-known principle of judicial construction that the preamble of a measure is not a part of the law. The preamble of the Jones bill simply declares the purpose of the people of the United States at some indefinite time in the future to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands. In my judgment, this preamble carries the germs of insurrection and revolution. Strike the preamble from the bill and I think many of us can support the bill. The preamble can never have the force of law. Anyone who is familiar with the oriental character and the mental processes of eastern peoples will recognize the fact that the preamble is loaded with danger. It was an alleged promise of the recognition of Philippine independence that brought about our first Philippine insurrection immediately after the War with Spain. Aguinaldo claimed that he had the promise of Admiral Dewey for such recognition. Admiral Dewey, on the other hand, stated unequivocally that there never was such a promise made by him; and as between Aguinaldo and Admiral Dewey, the overwhelming majority of the American people take the word of the distinguished victor of the Battle of Manila Bay.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard some remarkable statements made on this floor within the last half hour or so regarding conditions in the Philippines. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] stated in effect that at the time the Americans went into the Philippine Islands the natives had about accomplished their independence; that thereupon we came in and took possession of the islands. My friend from Missouri is not familiar with Philippine history. Nearly six months before our entrance upon the scene the leaders of the revolution against Spain had sold out their people. They agreed to accept ₱800,000, and in consideration thereof some of their leaders, including Aguinaldo, promised to lay down their arms and to quit the islands forever; ₱400,000 were deposited to Aguinaldo's credit, or to the credit of Aguinaldo & Co., in a bank in Hongkong; ₱200,000 were paid to Isabelo Artacho, to be divided among the insurgent leaders remaining in Biacnabato in the Philippines, and I believe ₱200,000 were never paid. But they got to quarreling among themselves about the loot. Aguinaldo denied the right of Artacho and his followers to divide the ₱200,000 paid to them by Primo de Rivara, the Spanish governor general, and claimed it should have been sent to him at Hongkong. Subsequently Artacho went over to Hongkong and commenced a suit in the supreme court of Hongkong for an accounting. Then Aguinaldo and two or three of his followers, under assumed names, sailed out of Hongkong and started to go to Europe without having made an accounting. Those are historical facts. What is the use of trying to fool ourselves? What is the use of trying to fool the American people?

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield in a moment. Aguinaldo, accompanied by G. H. del Pilar and J. M. Leyba, all traveling under assumed names, went down to Singapore on their way to Europe. At Singapore they learned that war was about to break out between Spain and this country. Then, in violation of their agreement that they would quit the Philippines, they sought the good offices of the representatives of the United States Government and asked to be taken back, and our officials agreed to take, and later on did take, them back. Then, after the American occupation, they claimed that Admiral Dewey had promised them independence, and a new revolution started in the Philippines, this time against the Americans. Admiral Dewey said positively that he had never made any promise of independence, and other officials stated that they had never made any promise of independence. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has made some exceedingly derogatory remarks about the leaders and patriots of the Philippine Islands. He has said that they sold out the liberties of their people to the Spanish Government, and that his charges were historical facts. I want to ask the gentleman if he can vouch a single respectable authority for that statement. Does he know of any history ever written of the Philippines that contains any such statement?

Mr. KAHN. The treaty of Biacnabato speaks for itself. And not only that, but Dr. Dean C. Worcester states the same thing in his work entitled "The Philippines, Past and Present." And, I may add further, these were matters of common report and notoriety when I was in the islands two years after the American occupation.

Mr. JONES. I do not believe that any man who knows anything about the history of the Philippines will believe such a statement.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that Aguinaldo and several of his followers left there? Is it not a fact that they agreed to receive ₱800,000 on condition that they would never come back into the islands? Is there not the evidence of the lawsuit in Hongkong for the accounting?

Mr. JONES. There is the fact that they received ₱800,000, but it is not a fact that Aguinaldo ever used a dollar of that money for his own purposes.

Mr. KAHN. I did not charge that he did.

Mr. JONES. I think the gentleman did.

Mr. KAHN. I did not. I said there was a suit for an accounting, whereupon he drew out ₱50,000 from the chartered bank, which had become due under the terms of the deposit, and ran away.

Mr. JONES. Is it not a fact that the gentleman said that Aguinaldo and his fellow compatriots sold out their people to the Spanish? That is not true.

Mr. KAHN. What did they agree to take the ₱800,000 for? Why did they leave the Philippines and agree never to come back? These facts are all true.

Mr. QUEZON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from the Philippine Islands?

Mr. KAHN. I do.

Mr. QUEZON. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Is the gentleman informed of the fact that in the treaty of Biacnabato, when it was agreed to give this money to these leaders, it was stated that the Spanish Government was going to give the Filipino people these reforms in the government of the islands that had caused that revolution?

Mr. KAHN. I believe the Spanish Government did agree to inaugurate certain reforms.

Mr. QUEZON. Is it not also true that the Filipino leaders took the money with them to Hongkong, but that Mr. Aguinaldo did not use the money, but kept it in the bank, and then, when Spain did not comply with the terms of the treaty that she would establish the reforms in the government, Aguinaldo went back and used the money to buy guns to compel Spain to comply with the treaty? That is history.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman from the Philippines explains the thing in a plausible way.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. I must decline to yield at present. I want to answer the gentleman's [Mr. QUEZON] question. The fact remains that the treaty of Biacnabato was signed December 15, 1897, and only about four months elapsed before Aguinaldo left Hongkong to go to Europe. He did not, so far as my investigation of the matter has been able to discover, apply the money for the purchase of arms. He started for Europe under an assumed name. Dean Worcester quotes Maj. J. R. M. Taylor as saying that "he gave as his reason for departure that he was going to remain under cover until Artacho could be bought off." Aguinaldo went as far as Singapore. When he arrived there the trouble between Spain and the United States had grown to be acute. Then he got into touch, through a newspaper man down there, an Englishman named Bray, with our consul general, Mr. E. Spencer Pratt, who in turn put him in touch with the consul general at Hongkong and with Admiral Dewey. That is how he got back into the Philippine Islands. There is no mystery about it; the facts will be patent to anyone who wants to look into them.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is the statement the gentleman just made any stranger than the facts recorded in the proceedings of the insurgents, the record of which we have, during the time between Dewey's taking possession of Manila and the time that Aguinaldo was taken? Is there anything more strange in the gentleman's statement than that record shows?

Mr. KAHN. There is not.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of these events it is small wonder that the people of the United States readily and fully believed the statements of the Admiral of the Navy as to his refusal to give any promise for Philippine independence. And yet on the mere assertion by Aguinaldo that such a promise had been made to him, he again raised an insurrectionary army in the Philippines. For months he caused bloodshed, and brought ruin and disaster to thousands of his countrymen.

If this bill should pass with its expressed promise of independence, it will be a serious blow to the islands, in my judgment. Capital will refuse to invest in the archipelago. The politicos, or politicians, of the Philippines will constantly agitate for the fulfillment at an early date of the promise contained in the preamble of the Jones bill. Many of us who have visited the Philippines doubt the ability of the Filipino peoples for self-government, at least at any time in the near future. I speak of the Filipino peoples, because the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are not a homogeneous people. They are divided into many tribes and subdivisions. They speak many different languages and dialects. Although Spain exercised sovereignty over the archipelago for over 300 years, a vast majority of the inhabitants never spoke, and were absolutely unable to speak, Spanish at all. The Filipino peoples are also divided into two great religious classes—the Christians and the non-Christians. The latter number fully a million inhabitants and are themselves broken into many subdivisions. These subdivisions of the non-Christian peoples differ in language, customs, habits, and traditions, and until our occupancy of the archipelago many of them were constantly at war with each other. They had made no advance whatever in the scale of political development, and in many instances were even without tribal government or organization. It is frequently claimed by the so-called anti-imperialists of the United States that the peoples of the Philippines are as capable of self-government as the people of Cuba. Mr. Chairman, conditions in Cuba and the Philippines are entirely dissimilar. The people of Cuba have one language and one religion. There is no fanatical Mohammedan population in Cuba. There are no heathen tribes in Cuba. And yet since Cuba was originally given her independence in 1898 the Government of the United States found it necessary at least on one occasion to intervene between the conflicting elements in that island. I believe it cost the people of the United States between six and eight millions of dollars on that occasion to put down civil strife in Cuba.

Does anyone doubt that civil strife will tear asunder the Government of the Philippines if we should withdraw from the islands and grant their peoples independence? Why, the situation in Mexico will pale into insignificance when compared to the quarrels that will break out between the rival politicos in the Philippines. The troubles of the Filipino peoples and the troubles of the Cubans and the troubles of the Mexicans arise largely through personal politics. Personal politics is the curse of those countries. Mr. Chairman, we ought not to let doctrinaires and theorists lead us into a hideous mistake that is sure to bring misfortune and disaster to the great mass of Filipinos. The demand for independence in the Philippines arises almost entirely from the politicians, or politicos, as they are called. The politicos are supported in their demand chiefly by the Tagalogs. This demand for independence is largely artificial. It is not a real demand. Anyone who knows anything at all about the archipelago knows that the peoples of the Philippines are easily led and influenced.

There are thousands of natives who do not even know the meaning of the word "independence." I have had called to my attention the case of Ruperto Rios, of the Tagalog Province of Tayabas. This worthy in succession promoted himself to brigadier and major general, and then announced himself as generalissimo. He was a cunning bandit who was caught by the Americans, and, after his trial and conviction on the charge of murder in 1910, was very properly hanged. It is told of him that he used to promise as a reward for the commission of any deed of special villainy in which he might be interested a bit of "independencia"—independence. He would show his dupes a box with the word "Independencia" painted on it and declare to them that it contained a supply which had been sent to him from Manila. He never failed to find men who were willing, on promise of the receipt of a bit of this "independencia," alleged to be contained in that box, to carry out any devilry that he might plan. I merely cite the case to illustrate the point that thousands of the natives are entirely ignorant of the very meaning of independence. Indeed, it is a well-known fact that the farther away from Manila one travels the less one hears of independence.

The island of Mindanao, in the south, is the largest of the group. It is peopled principally by Mohammedans and savages. Prior to the advent of the Americans the Moros of that island and Jolo were engaged in piracy, and made frequent excursions to the more northern islands, burning, killing, and carrying off slaves. It is more than likely that under independence this island, left to its own devices, would revert to its former condition and be lost to civilization. Hon. John M. Dickinson, formerly Secretary of War of the United States, visited that island in August, 1910. During that visit Secretary Dickinson, responding to the plea of a Filipino for immediate independence, with consequent control of the Moros, declared the Government of the United States to be unwilling to intrust to the 66,000 Filipinos living in Mindanao the government of the 350,000 Moros residing in that Province. There were four datos, or chiefs, present, with 2,000 of their people, who, representing a population of 40,000 Moros, at the close of the speech of Secretary Dickinson swore allegiance to our Government, and requested that if the Americans ever should withdraw from their country they—the Moros—should be placed in control of it. At the same time they stated that they would begin to fight their northern neighbors as soon as the Americans should take their departure.

The Moros testified to their appreciation of what our Government has done for them, and the four chiefs declared that they were well contented to let matters continue as they are. Why, sir, up to the time of the American occupation of the islands a Filipino dared not go beyond the walls of the city of Jolo, the capital of the Moro people, for fear of losing his life, so bitter was the antagonism between Moro and Filipino.

It is a well-known fact, too, that the Christianized Filipinos have nothing in common with the pagan mountaineers of northern Luzon. They fear and dread the head-hunters of those mountain Provinces. I doubt whether any considerable number of Tagalogs had ever ventured far into the country of the Igorrotes, for prior to American occupation there was constant strife between them. Indeed, a Christian governor of one of the Provinces bordering on the territory occupied by the wild tribes expressed the belief that the only way to treat these neighboring tribes, who numbered about 50,000 souls, was to kill them all. He contended that they were worse than useless. He opposed the expenditure of moneys for their benefit, and contended that by killing them off all questions as to their welfare would be answered forever.

Mr. Chairman, it were well to let the future take care of the problem we have on our hands in connection with our ownership and government of the Philippines. I stated on a former occasion on this floor that our Government, at an earlier period of our country's history, made a grievous mistake in yielding up territory of the United States without a full knowledge of what that step would mean for future generations. I refer to the Oregon country controversy, when the battle cry of the Democratic Party, in the campaign of 1844, was "Fifty-four forty or fight." If we had maintained our position in that controversy and had retained the territory between the forty-ninth degree of north latitude and the southern boundary of Alaska, we would have had no boundary disputes with Great Britain, and that powerful nation would never have had a seaport on the Pacific Ocean side of the American Continent. Let us not make another mistake of that character at this time.

But there is another reason, a humanitarian reason, why we should not promise to withdraw from the islands for many years to come, and that is this: When our troops took possession of the islands there were thousands of natives who promptly swore allegiance to the Government of the United States. Of course they were not the fiery fighters of the Philippine insurrection. They were a substantial part of the population who wanted peace for their unhappy country. They took no interest in the personal ambitions of men who styled themselves Filipino patriots and deemed that the actuating motive of the latter was largely the lust for office and gain. Then, too, we remember the loyal support given our armed forces by the Macabebe Scouts. These men helped to fight our battles in the Philippines. We owe all of these people protection—protection for their lives and property. The history of the Philippines prior to the advent of the Americans is replete with instances of the summary vengeance visited by those in power upon the luckless heads of those who had incurred the displeasure of the latter. It is not so many years ago since burying their enemy alive was one of the favorite methods of dispatching an adversary. Several generations will probably have to pass off the scene before the animosities engendered during the early days of American occupation shall have been forgotten or forgiven.

Mr. Chairman, I firmly believe that if this preamble to the Jones bill should be adopted and is to express the attitude of our Government toward the Philippines it would be well to let the natives of those islands know in no uncertain language that if we ever withdraw it will not be the policy of this Government to exercise a protectorate over them. The natives should be taught, once and for all, that if we ever leave the islands we will leave them for good. That if we leave they will have to assume all responsibility for their national defense; they will have to protect themselves against the possible encroachments of those countries that are bent on extending their colonial possessions. They must be taught that they will have to maintain their own army and their own navy to insure their independence if the forces of the United States once take their departure. I believe, sir, that if this fact is brought home to the Philippine people without equivocation and with proper emphasis the politicos or politicians of the archipelago, whose principal stock in trade to-day is a demand for Filipino independence, will find themselves like Othello—their occupation gone. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, if this debate has demonstrated anything to the American Congress and to the American people, it has demonstrated the scant information upon which we are attempting to legislate upon the rights and destinies of 7,000,000 people. Yet we have assumed for 14 years control of the most intimate and internal affairs with such scarcity of knowledge and information as has been brought out here in this debate. As a climax to that farce comes now the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] with his 13-year-old information, and tells us how bandits lived there 13 years ago when he was familiar with the islands, and when the first insurrection had been suppressed and the first boatload of American school-teachers had just landed in the islands——

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members present, a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. I wanted to give the correct date. The incident I spoke of in connection with the trial and execution of Ruperto Rios occurred in 1910, four years ago.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but I was warranted in saying that the gentleman began his address by saying it was 13 years ago to-day when he left the islands——

Mr. KAHN. No; when I landed in San Francisco from the islands.

Mr. BORLAND. When he landed in San Francisco from the islands, the day——

Mr. KAHN. Has the gentleman ever been in the islands?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not claim the information which the gentleman claims—the day that the first insurrection had been suppressed and the first boatload of American teachers had landed. It is on that kind of information we are to deny these people the right of government.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, with the persistence of gentlemen on that side of the House, misquotes me and misstates the facts.

Mr. BORLAND. I have yielded to the gentleman, and will be glad to do so. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to have given the care and attention that men who have visited the islands or gentlemen on our committee have given to it. I concur with the judgment of the committee that the time has now come to take a step——

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. BORLAND. That, according to the majority report and the minority report, has been the declared policy of this Government from the acquisition of the islands. Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Does the gentleman know whether the President of the United States has had a personal representative visit the Philippine Islands and whether or not a report has been made and the nature of the report on this question?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not; no. But the point I wish to make is this: That we have assumed to govern for 14 years a distant people, having their own aspirations, their own local needs, and their own problems to solve.

And we have assumed to-day, with no more information than we have seen disclosed in this debate, and the gentlemen of the minority are insisting, that we continue in the same attitude toward those people and toward the world, and to continue to govern with no more agreement upon the facts upon which our legislation is based than there has been shown here on this floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Are you in favor of the independence of the Philippines; and if so, when?

Mr. BORLAND. I will come to that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why was it not put in your bill? While you have control of the Government and all its branches, why do you not introduce a bill that squares with your theory?

I think this bill does square with our theory, and I think it comes so near squaring with the promises held out by the present minority when they were in power that it puts them in a very embarrassing position. The great difficulty, I want to say to the gentleman, is that we have continued, on account of what has been recognized as a political mistake of the former majority in control of this Government, the policy of the indefinite retention of the islands, with an undeclared policy, which, in my judgment, is the worst political mistake we can make. I want to say that I do not think if it had not been made a cardinal political principle of the platform of the gentleman's party, that that mistake would never have been persisted in or be seriously persisted in now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. On this side of the House we have declared unequivocally that we are not in favor of independence. You have talked independence, and now are you in favor of it, and will you put something of that kind in your bill?

Mr. BORLAND. This bill does exactly what I think at this juncture ought to be done. It enlarges the power of the Filipino people to govern themselves, places a measure of responsibility upon them, to which, if they respond as it is expected they will respond, independence ought to follow. That is my idea about that bill, and I think that is the policy of the gentlemen who drew it. I concede, and I am glad to concede, that American occupation of those islands has been productive of lasting good to the people of the islands. I am glad to know that the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines frankly and boldly declares that American occupation has resulted in substantial improvement in the general condition of his people. And I want to say that, proud as I am of that fact and confident as I was that that would be the result and has been the result wherever the American flag has flown, I can not deny to the Filipino people themselves the just degree of credit they have in the result. I do not believe that that result could have been accomplished unless the material of citizenship was in the islands upon which the improvement could be made.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Do you agree in the theory that if we had not been in the islands, but had turned them over to the Filipinos, they would be just as far advanced now as they are?

Mr. BORLAND. No. And I want to say to my good friend from Ohio that it is utterly immaterial whether we agree with the Commissioner on that point or not. But this point is material, that my respect for the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Islands, whom I highly respect and love, would be lessened if he did not make and believe such an assertion. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If he did not believe that his own people, left to themselves and freed from Spain or any other power, would have developed better and faster than they have under a foreign power, I would not hold the respect for him and I would not treasure the regard for his patriotism that I now do.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. Whether it is true or not is, in my judgment, utterly immaterial.

Mr. FESS. Would you be willing to proceed as a legislator on the basis that he said that because he ought to do so, whether it is true or not?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and one reason why is because a race that will produce a man that will take that high stand of patriotism is producing men that will make self governing citizens.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would the gentleman hold, it having been proved to the contrary by history as we have read it, that a country that has made no progress of its own in about 300 years would in 10 years reach that same altitude of social progress that it took our race 1,000 years to reach?

Mr. BORLAND. There are many assumptions in the gentleman's contention, and I do not agree with the premise. I am not prepared to say that they have not made any progress in 300 years.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Comparatively.

Mr. BORLAND. I can not agree with all of the assumptions in the gentleman's premises.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not expect you would do so.

I am just as proud of the results obtained there by the Americans as my friend, the Resident Commissioner, is of the contribution to those results made by the Filipino people, and he and myself are good friends on that score. Whether the Americans contributed the most or the Filipinos contributed the most, we have a right to our own opinion.

Mr. GORDON. Is that 20-mile automobile road that the Americans built over there one of the things of which you are proud?

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say to my friend that he recalls a point I want to make, and that is that carpetbag government is the worst species of government we can engage in. I believe in local self-government by the consent of the governed, so that there is always a check upon the action of those in power by those who are on the spot and know what is going on. I am free to say, although I hold a share technically in the responsibility for that road, I do not know anything about it, and I do not believe any American Congress can regulate local affairs of that kind, and that is one of the reasons why I am in favor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. JONES. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I desire to ask if the gentleman's party did not specifically declare in its platform against a carpetbag government in Alaska and then appoint nonresident officials there this year?

Mr. BORLAND. I was about to say this, Mr. Chairman: That while I have no familiarity with the conditions in the Philippine Islands, and while I recognize that if I were charged with the responsibility and insisted upon retaining them I ought to have some intimate knowledge of the conditions there, I am not in a position to discharge the powers of local legislation upon those islands without that knowledge, but it ought to be committed to those who are on the ground and know what the problems are.

But I have some knowledge of conditions in one of the other colonies of this country—Porto Rico—and I know that the advance of the Porto Ricans into a control over their own government has had the best steadying and developing effect of any step ever taken by the American Congress. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] was unfortunate in his reference to the Louisiana Purchase, even if the conditions were the same in other respects and it were contiguous territory.

As a matter of fact we have pursued unvaryingly in this country three steps of developing acquired territory: First, we put it under military rule; second, we organized a civil government of a limited character, with an elective lower house and an appointive council and governor; third, we established two elective houses, with a governor only retained by the national power, and the next step beyond that is statehood or independence.

Now, unless statehood is the legitimate aspiration of any section of acquired territory, independence ought to be their legitimate aspiration. If the gentlemen can say that this policy of indefinite retention, with an undeclared policy, has been beneficial to the Philippine Islands, they are entitled to insist upon its continuance. But if they want to go back to the original doctrine of the Republican Party, that ultimately the Filipino people must govern themselves, then they must point the way either to independence or to statehood. If they can not point the way to statehood, to becoming an integral part of this great Nation of ours, then the Filipino people have the right to work out their own destiny and the attainment of their own racial and national aspirations.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he would apply that rule to Hawaii and Porto Rico?

Mr. BORLAND. I would apply it to Porto Rico. I have not any familiarity with Hawaii. I anticipate final statehood for Porto Rico. I have no hesitation about saying that.

Mr. TOWNER. What do you say about Hawaii?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know about Hawaii.

Mr. TOWNER. You know it belongs to the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I know it belongs to the United States, and I know that the Philippine Islands belong to the United States.

Mr. TOWNER. And that it is situated thousands of miles away from the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. As I understand it, we have responsibilities resting upon our shoulders that we imperfectly meet, and I think the gentleman from Iowa must admit that.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal of the jingo talk that used to be popular about 10 years ago, about hauling down the American flag. That used to be the prime art of the demagogue when he wanted to defend the attitude of the administration toward the Philippines, to get up and whoop and hurrah about the dishonor of hauling down the American flag. I will tell you where the national honor is more involved. It is in making a success of our control of those countries. There is no dishonor in hauling down the American flag, but there is dishonor in keeping up our domination over a people whose status we refuse to recognize; and if we want to point to the glory of this country, we point not to the jingo talk about not hauling down the American flag, but to the solemn declaration we have made against a war of aggrandizement and acquisition of territory. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And if we can convince ourselves and the world that we were sincere and honest when we said we entered into that war not for aggrandizement or the acquisition of territory, but that we purposed to carry out in good faith the destiny of the people who fell within our hands, there is more honor in the redemption of that solemn pledge than in all the jingo talk about not hauling down the American flag that any demagogue ever indulged in. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I yield back any time I have remaining, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Iowa desire to use any of his time?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the title and preamble of the bill reads:

A bill to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands.

Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and

Whereas for the speedy accomplishment of such purpose it is desirable to place in the hands of the people of the Philippines as large a control of their domestic affairs as can be given them without in the meantime impairing the exercise of the rights of sovereignty by the people of the United States, in order that, by the use and exercise of popular franchise and governmental powers, they may be the better prepared to fully assume the responsibilities and enjoy all the privileges of complete independence: Therefore—

And so forth.

The question before us can be considered a domestic question only in a limited sense, for it is so closely connected with our responsibilities to the civilized world and with our relations to other nations that in a larger and truer sense it is international and of international concern.

I regret that this bill has been framed in a partisan spirit and has been brought in as a party measure, under gag rule, in order, as it is proclaimed, to carry out the pledges of a party platform four times repeated and four times rejected by a majority of the people of the United States. I commend to the consideration of the majority party in this House and to the American people the declaration of the Republican platform on this subject in 1912, which says:

The Philippine policy of the Republican Party has been and is inspired by the belief that our duty toward the Filipino people is a national obligation which should remain entirely free from partisan politics.

How different the attitude of the Democratic Party! At the first opportunity after the close of the Spanish War and the acquisition of the Philippines, in the platform of 1900, they denounced the acquisition of the Philippines as un-American and declared for their immediate independence. The substance of this declaration was repeated in 1904, 1908, and 1912. Their last declaration is as follows:

We reaffirm the position thrice announced by the Democracy in national convention assembled against a policy of imperialism and colonial exploitation in the Philippines or elsewhere. We condemn the experiment in imperialism as an inexcusable blunder, which has involved us in enormous expenses, brought us weakness instead of strength, and laid our Nation open to the charge of abandonment of the fundamental doctrine of self-government. We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

In recognizing the independence of the Philippines our Government should retain such land as may be necessary for coaling stations and naval bases.

This bill is brought forward as an attempt to fulfill these platform promises, although it falls far short of that. I will not go into an examination or criticism of the body of the bill; that has been done very ably by others, but I want to call attention to the title and preamble. The title is to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the Philippine Islands and to provide for an autonomous government for those islands. There is not, however, one word in the bill that declares anything as to the future status of the islands, except by inference and innuendo. The preamble reads:

Whereas it was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of the War with Spain to make it a war of conquest or territorial aggrandizement; and

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

It will be observed that these declarations relate to the past, and not to the future. The War with Spain was undertaken as a duty to humanity, but it did result both in conquest and in territorial expansion and aggrandizement; in fact, these were the necessary consequences of the war, and no one can say that the intention of the American people was contrary to these results. We were victorious and acquired the Philippines, Guam, Cuba, and Porto Rico. Our declaration of war against Spain contained these provisions in reference to Cuba:

That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people. (Apr. 20, 1898.)

Note that this declaration of intention as to the exercise of sovereignty by the American people was carefully limited to the island of Cuba, and if Congress had at that time intended not to extend its sovereignty in any event over any other Spanish territory it would have so declared. I object to having this clause enacted more than 16 years after the fact. I do not believe that the Democratic Party as represented in Congress to-day is either authorized or competent to say what the intention of the American people was at that time.

The second clause also relates to the past purposes of the people of the United States. I think it is a safe rule to scrutinize with great care every bill, whether it be in the form of a preamble or an enactment, which relates to past events. Congress, being possessed of the legislative power only, should, as a rule, confine its enactments and declarations to the future. It is the very essence of legislative power that it looks to the future. It is the very essence of judicial power that it looks to the past, and the legislature can not authoritatively declare what the law is or has been, but only what it shall be. It is not competent for Congress now to declare what the purpose of the United States was with regard to the Philippine Islands 16 years ago. Whatever that purpose was we can not change it. It must be determined by the facts of history.

The Republican platform for 1900, more than a year after the ratification of the treaty of Paris, by which we acquired the Philippines, was as follows:

In accepting by the treaty of Paris the just responsibility of our victories in the Spanish War, the President and the Senate won the undoubted approval of the American people. No other course was possible than to destroy Spain's sovereignty throughout the West Indies and in the Philippine Islands. That course created our responsibility before the world and with the unorganized population whom our intervention had freed from Spain to provide for the maintenance of law and order and for the establishment of good government and for the performance of international obligations.

Our authority could not be less than our responsibility, and wherever sovereign rights were extended it became the high duty of the Government to maintain its authority, to put down armed insurrection, and to confer the blessings of liberty and civilization upon all the rescued peoples.

The largest measure of self-government consistent with their welfare and our duties shall be secured to them by law.

Upon this platform President McKinley ran for reelection and received 7,207,923 votes, as against 6,358,193 cast for the Democratic candidate, who demanded the immediate independence of the Philippines and denounced the Republican policy. Four years later Theodore Roosevelt was elected over Parker by more than a million and a half majority on the same issue. At the last election Wilson received 6,293,019, and Taft and Roosevelt, who both favored the Republican position on the Philippine question, received 7,604,463 votes, or a majority of 1,311,444. It is therefore manifestly erroneous to say that the American people, or a majority of them, have ever favored the policy of the Democratic Party either as declared in their various platforms or as attempted to be enacted in this bill.

While the Democratic Party might now, through their control of Congress, appropriately make a declaration as to the future policy of the Nation in regard to the Philippines, they have no right to make a retroactive one as to what the policy was when they did not control it. What do they say here? They say it never was the intention, at the incipiency of the War with Spain, to make it a war of "conquest" or "territorial aggrandizement." The meaning sought to be conveyed seems to be that these despicable results were unintentionally inflicted upon an innocent people by our armed forces, and that we now disclaim them and desire to undo the work as far and as soon as possible! That, it seems to me, is what most people will understand by it. I wonder what the American people will think of this. The Philippines cost us much blood and treasure. Many of the brave sons of your State and mine fought and suffered there, and many of them are sleeping in lonely graves in those distant lands. I wonder what they would say if they could come back to earth and hear these things. They at least believed they were fighting for a just cause, and perchance with their dying breath chanted the beautiful words of the Battle Hymn of the Republic:

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me,
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free,
While God is marching on.

If they could come back now, would they not be surprised to hear that they did something of which the Nation is ashamed and disclaims any intention of doing?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman from Iowa give me more time?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, conquest, as well as territorial aggrandizement, is the usual and ordinary result of war, and must be held to have been in the contemplation of every belligerent. We certainly undertook that war with the intention of winning, which meant to conquer and conquest—conquest against the dark forces of anarchy and savagery and for human liberty and civilization. The fact that we intended to use the power gained by conquest for the benefit of the people concerned and the advancement of human liberty does not change the nature of the act. It was conquest nevertheless, but honorable and praiseworthy, because undertaken in the interest of liberty and humanity.

We hurl back the insinuation against our national honor and still sing:

Then conquer we must when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust!"
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Clerk will read.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY] is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. ANSBERRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TOWNER. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AINEY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am quite in accord with those gentlemen who have said that the Philippine question should be considered apart from partisan politics.

I am not so much concerned at the present moment in party declarations as I am concerned, and deeply so, in determining my duty as an American citizen, presently charged by an American constituency with the performance of a duty on the floor of this House with respect to a measure the influence of which is likely to prove of so much importance in the present and of so far-reaching consequence in the future.

I have therefore sought for all available information and tried to consider the question from all the several angles from which it has been presented.

We are not agreed upon a statement of the facts; we are not agreed as to the materiality of some of these facts; we are not harmonized as to the standing or authority of those whose opinions are quoted nor upon whose observations we may rely.

A wide difference of opinion as to our duty with respect to the Philippines has developed, and greater still is the divergence when it comes to a consideration of the best method by which our duty may be performed.

I regret exceedingly the extended range of this debate, developing so many phases, political and historical, economic and altruistic, and even invading the realm of our future as likely to be affected by the great world movements in the coming days.

This regret is not because these subjects are not involved in the Philippine question as a whole, but because they carry the mind over such a wide extent that it is not possible within the confines of legitimate debate to adequately analyze or fairly discuss them.

Surely I can not be accused of presenting a partisan witness if I shall ask you to listen to the words of a distinguished member of the present Cabinet, one who has traveled extensively in the Philippines and carefully observed the varied conditions. While I have indulged in the privilege of differing with him on many political questions, of him personally I have the highest regard; his statements covering his observations would for me be a sufficient guaranty of their accuracy. I present his statement to you for the purpose of seeing if we may not from a disinterested and, at least from my standpoint, nonpartisan expression, arrive at some important, salient facts. In an address which he made at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., but little over two years ago, he spoke of his trip to the Philippines and of his observations of the people on his travels into the interior. Of some of these Filipinos, he said:

He does not know how to read or write. He can not speak the language of the man 10 miles down the railroad track. He can not speak the language of the man 25 miles up the railroad track. He speaks no Spanish; he speaks no English; he speaks his native dialect, and that is all. His children are beginning to be taught English now. We go up the track 25 miles and we come into the other Province and another language. And now, passing on to the end of the road and taking the Government automobile up to the hilltop, we begin to find the non-Christian tribes. I will not take time to describe their clothing, although it is so limited that I might do so without losing time.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. AINEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Whom is the gentleman quoting?

Mr. AINEY. I thought I would reserve that statement until the conclusion of the reading. I think it will interest some of these gentlemen to do that.

He continues:

These half-naked men are men, these mountaineers. * * * and you begin to get a faint idea that there is no such thing as a Filipino people. A man who had courage to say that there was, in what we ordinarily mean by that word, such a thing as one Filipino people would say what was either a very ignorant thing or a very ridiculous thing.

In one day, through four languages, from perhaps the cultured people of the Tagalog Tribe in Manila up to the cultured or partly cultured, dog-eating and hunting Igorrotes, is the unified people of whom we read in the speeches of some Tagalog politicians. Here is a task which is simply this—the making of a people.

We have not here to deal with an Indian tribe that must be educated from childhood into manhood; we have here the absolute act of creation of a people, and that creation is going to be an act of slow growth if it is to be a permanent one.

I am sure he had not in mind the distinguished Delegate from the Philippine Islands, who has so recently and eloquently addressed you, and therefore he was not the one in particular to whom reference is intended in the address, which continues:

The Tagalog people—you will observe I will not say Filipino people, I do not recognize that there is such yet; I hope there is coming to be a Filipino people—the Tagalog people excel in all the arts of expression. A political Tagalog orator would bring tears from a wooden Indian! He would apply the principles of the Declaration of Independence with a sonority and comprehensiveness that the fathers of this Republic never dreamed of, and he will believe probably that so long as he himself can govern the toa, and so long as Igorrotes may be beneath his care and the Negrito may be his subject, and so long as somebody, somewhere or other, will keep the fierce and fanatical Moro off his hands, he will believe in independence. But what folly it is that people speaking 20 or more diverse languages, differing in customs, in habitat, some lowlanders, some mountaineers, through heathenism to paganism, through Christianity to Mohammedism, 1,500 miles apart, some peaceful, some fanatical, some warlike, others peasant farmers—what a pitiful idea it is that this mass, united by a law passed twelve or fourteen thousand miles away, should be turned loose upon the world to be governed by a minority of their own number! It is perfectly inconceivable to me that anybody knowing even the superficial facts should venture to think for a moment that the so-called Philippine Republic aimed at to-day by certain publicists in India would have either life or liberty!

* * * * * * *

Now, one final suggestion as to the Philippine policy. I believe that the question of separate independence of the Philippine Islands should be taken out of American politics until such time as, say, two-thirds of the adult male population of those islands are able, under the present very simple qualifications for voting, to exercise a deliberate judgment either against or in favor of it.

I am sure that the gentlemen of this House will be interested to know that these are the words of the Hon. William C. Redfield, now Secretary of Commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. I will.

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman has done some traveling lately in the Orient. I would like to inquire if he thinks that is a fair and honorable statement of the conditions there.

Mr. AINEY. If the gentleman is suggesting by his inquiry that I visited the Philippine Islands, I want to say that I did not have that opportunity.

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman gives full credence to the statement?

Mr. AINEY. I certainly do, knowing Mr. Redfield.

Mr. CLINE. Is the gentleman as favorable to the economic statements of Mr. Redfield as he is about the conditions in the Philippines?

Mr. AINEY. I would accept Mr. Redfield's statements of fact at any time and place; nor does it in anywise lessen my high personal regard for him or his opinions that I disagree with Mr. Redfield's conclusions with respect to the tariff. [Applause on the Republican side.] Does that answer the inquiry of the gentleman?

Mr. CLINE. Yes. I wanted to know if the gentleman was in harmony with Mr. Redfield's economic suggestion.

Mr. AINEY. I accept unquestioningly Mr. Redfield's statement of facts, because I believe the distinguished gentleman who occupies a position in the President's Cabinet is one of the ablest men in that Cabinet, and that he would not for a moment lend himself to a misstatement of conditions as he saw them. I disagree with him very radically in some of his political conceptions. Let me now present another statement of facts which I believe to be uncontroverted and to my mind of vital importance.

The First Philippine Assembly was elected in 1907. Out of a population of 8,000,000 there were but 98,257 votes cast.

At the election in 1909 there were 192,975 voters, being less than 3 per cent of the population.

At the election in 1912 there were registered 248,154; only 235,786 persons voted. Of those who voted but 81,916 possessed the requisite educational qualifications. The other voters came in on property qualifications, or because they had held office under the Spanish régime. The proportion of participating literate electors to the population in the territory affected was 1.47 per cent. Whatever the cause, and without for the moment discussing who is responsible for the condition, the fact remains that at the present time an almost infinitesimal number of Filipinos are participating in the election of members of the legislature (assembly), which we have granted them. That legislature, therefore, can not be said to have yet attained the position of a body representative of the Filipino people.

Strictly speaking, it represents but 250,000 electors out of a total population of 8,000,000.

I am concerned as to the people who are not a part of that small electorate, the great mass who do not or can not vote.

Until the United States by education and attention has taught this immense majority of nonelectors how to vote, and secured them in the right, it has not fulfilled its duty.

The conferring of more power and authority at the top is wrong construction; we must build from the bottom. It is not now so much the question of opening of high positions to and conferring more authority upon the 250,000 electors as to giving our attention to the overwhelming numerical majority of non-voters now having no part in the function of government.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because it violates safe and sane fundamental principles. It proposes to weaken the Federal authority of the Federal Government without relieving that Government of responsibility.

In governments responsibility and authority must go hand in hand. To retain responsibility while yielding authority is inane. To disturb the equipoise between them is unwise.

I may not in the brief time at my disposal do more than hint at the marvelous accomplishments under American control, nor the peculiar aptitude shown by the Filipino.

If, however, this splendid work of the American Government is not completed, it ties its hands; it retains the right to veto bad legislation, but has no power whatever to enact or enforce good.

If there be any further duty owing by the American Government to the Philippine peoples, it is one of construction. This bill does not meet that need, because its emphasis is directed toward strengthening the hands of an already powerful though small directing class (gente illustrada), which through a small electorate, 250,000 voters, is and would remain in control of the legislative body. The true place of emphasis should be to create a strong, reliable middle class, both capable and having the right of franchise and desirous of exercising it.

A third fact, which I think will not be controverted, shows light upon the attitude of the numerically small gente illustrada, or directing class.

When in 1906 the Members of Congress visited the Philippines, the argument advanced in a memorial presented to them for immediate independence was:

> It is undeniable that there exists in the Philippines in sufficient numbers the so-called "directing class," a small portion of which is employed by the present government in all the branches of administration, cooperating actively and effectively with the government in its gubernatorial labor. If the Philippine Archipelago has a governable popular mass, called upon to obey, and a directing class in charge of leading, it then has conditions to govern itself by itself. These are the only two factors, without counting the casuals, who determine the popular capacity of a country. The directing class is the entity that knows how to lead, and the popular mass is the entity that knows how to obey.

Of all the gentlemen favoring this bill, the gentleman from the Philippines sees it in its true light. He favors it because it weakens the Federal control. His advocacy does not rest upon educational advantages accruing to the Filipino by larger opportunity to participate in the functions of government.

It is but the wedge upon which he and the other members of the gente illustrada, elected by 250,000 votes, propose to strike their blows which shall ultimately bring the split.

In an article which the gentleman from the Philippines recently published in his magazine is this:

[From the Filipino People, July, 1914, p. 16.]

> That, both now and ever, it will be the duty, as it undoubtedly is the intent, of all Filipinos to continue undiminished effort for the actual practical establishment of independence, free of all foreign control. We take for granted, and we once again solemnly pledge, both to the Filipino people and to those American citizens who have steadfastly supported the cause of free government, that there shall be no cessation or intermission of our efforts to secure the independence of the Philippines, either now or in the future, whatever Congress may do or may fail to do.

He takes the position that the people of the Philippines are capable of self-government, entitled to it, and need no assistance from the Federal Government, and therefore his position is perfectly consistent. But I can not conceive for a moment how other gentlemen can argue that the Government of the United States has further responsibility with respect to establishing conditions in the Philippines, which will lead to the highest and best in that country, and placing them so that they may be capable of self-government, and then support this bill which will deprive the United States of every vestige of authority for the accomplishment. If the American Government has any responsibility, it is along lines educational, political, and industrial to build these people up, and yet you are by this bill taking that authority away from yourselves and not relieving yourselves of the responsibility.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman pardon me for another interruption?

Mr. AINEY. Surely.

Mr. CLINE. Has it not been the theory not only of the Democratic Party in this House but also the theory of the Republican side of the House that autonomy ought to be extended to the Filipino people as rapidly as they were capable of exercising it?

Mr. AINEY. I think perhaps that may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. CLINE. If that be true, is it not a proper thing to extend that autonomy politically so that they may demonstrate whether they are capable of running their own affairs?

Mr. AINEY. The answer to that is, as stated by the gentleman from the Philippine Islands, that they do not need any such demonstration; it has already been made. The demonstration which is needed is not by giving larger legislative authority, which will be lapped up as quickly as a saucer of milk by the "gente illustrada," but by giving the great mass of the people—common people, if you please—who are admittedly without vote or say in the government, some part in its affairs. They must be educated and inspired both to know how and to exercise their part in any Philippine government. If that government shall be of the kind contemplated by the American people for them, it is a combined educational, sociological, economic, and political problem which confronts them. It can not be solved by law; it may be by schools.

Another fact appears in School Statistics Report of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, Philippine Islands, Brig. Gen. Frank McIntyre, Chief of Bureau, page 62:

American teachers	664
Philippine teachers	7,699
Population, excluding Moro Province, census of 1903	7,293,997
School population	1,215,666
Average monthly enrollment, 1911–12 (being 33 per cent of the school population, or 5 per cent of the total population)	395,075
Total number of schools	3,685
The school population is divided—
Secondary students	3,599
Intermediate-school pupils	24,458
Primary-school pupils	367,018

Lastly, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill because it fosters a condition which we are all seeking to avoid. I admit very frankly that in the Philippines the small but active "directing class" would like independence. It would be valuable to them. It would, in my judgment, be independence for them, but it would not be for the millions of inhabitants of that country just emerging from ignorance.

Anyone following the affairs of the Philippine Islands must know that every American in official station, no matter how unimpeachable his name or high his character, has been attacked and sought to be discredited by this small band of Filipinos unless he became an advocate of their demand for independence.

This bill is another step in arraying the "directing class" against the American Government, not that they have antipathy to the people of the United States, but the unrestrained control of 8,000,000 of people and the richest islands of the world by a mere handful of men is a stake well worth playing for, and upon it is based this vociferous demand by them for independence.

You are now seeking to put in the hands of 250,000 Filipino electors the power to make laws without any power to control what those laws shall be. Oh, yes, you reply, we still have the veto power; but there is no constructive power in a veto; it is merely negative; and if the responsibility still rests upon us to aid the Filipino people, we should have legislative control over that government so long as responsibility rests upon us. You have given the Filipinos one legislative branch of the government where they may originate laws, and now by appointment they have a majority in the other branch. They have the opportunity to make every law which in their judgment would lead to the betterment of their people, and you have thereby already limited to quite an extent the authority of the Federal Government.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Did not the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, Mr. MANN, say that when the bill came up under the five-minute rule he proposed to offer amendments giving them much more power and authority than this bill gives them?

Mr. AINEY. I heard him make that statement, and I have no doubt he will do it, but the authority will be along different lines than that proposed in the bill. I am not opposed to giving them authority. They have a wide range in municipal affairs; I am glad that they have constables and justices of the peace. I am pleased that there are judges and professional men among them. That is along the educational line, but now you propose to cut the very cord that holds the Stars and Stripes over that country, and I am opposed to it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AINEY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Has it not been the policy of the Republican Party from the first to extend, even more rapidly than probably they were capable of receiving and using, the autonomy, as the gentleman from Indiana calls it?

Mr. AINEY. We have undoubtedly done that.

Mr. TOWNER. Giving them self-government and home rule.

Mr. AINEY. Yes; but what I am trying to point out is not a step toward autonomy, it is a step toward oligarchy, and deprives this Government of any authority to control or interfere, whereby the unprotected masses of Filipinos might be brought within the beneficent privileges which we have always contemplated should be theirs. I am opposed to being placed in a position where we can not engage in a constructive policy or aid in the upward progress of the Filipino people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the treaty of peace of Paris was concluded December 10, 1898. Almost two years thereafter there was another treaty concluded with Spain by which the United States acquired the title to some islands in the Jolo Sea. The second treaty was concluded in November, 1900, and the main portion of that treaty provides that:

> Spain relinquishes to the United States all title and claim to title which she may have had at the time of the conclusion of the treaty of peace of Paris to any and all islands belonging to the Philippine Archipelago lying outside the lines described in article 3 of that treaty, and particularly to the islands of Cagayan Sulu and Sibutu and their dependencies, and agrees that all such islands shall be comprehended in the cession of the archipelago as fully as if they had been expressly included within those lines.

Now, the title to those islands in the United States is just as good as our title to Florida or to Alaska, and it seems to me that we should in considering this bill at this time do nothing to abridge our rights to do with these particular islands in the future as seems best shall be done as the future unfolds itself. I believe it will be a grave mistake at this time to include those islands with the Philippine Islands proper in a quitclaim deed that will forever foreclose our even considering the advisability of retaining them, if that should become important in the future I will state, too, that a quibble as to the consent of the governed can not be very well introduced with respect to them, because only one of the islands was inhabited at the time we obtained title to them, and the 50 or so people who lived on that one inhabited island had no organized government whatsoever, and were independent. In the matter of language, some of them speak Malay and some Sulu.

Mr. JONES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman say there is only one island in the Philippines that was inhabited at the time they came into our possession?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Only one island described in the second treaty concluded with Spain in the month of November, 1900.

Mr. JONES. That only one was inhabited?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Only one.

Mr. JONES. Which one was that?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Cagayan Sulu, which was some 8 miles long and 4 miles wide. That was the only island inhabited at the time, and, according to Congressman MILLER, of Minnesota, who recently made an exploration of all these islands, it is the only island occupied or inhabited at this time.

Mr. JONES. I do not want to take up more time of the gentleman, but I am utterly astounded at the gentleman's statement.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs mean to say that the islands described in the second treaty made with Spain, in November, 1900, are all inhabited, or were at the time we acquired them?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember what islands were described in that treaty, but I got the idea from the gentleman's statement that he was referring to one of the Philippine islands. If I have misunderstood the gentleman——

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The only islands I attempted to describe were the islands in the Jolo Sea, described in the treaty with Spain, from which I quoted.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman say he means the islands in the Jolo Sea, or north of Luzon?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Well, I have made the description of them as clear as I could.

Mr. JONES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I made it is plain as the English language describes it in the second treaty. The second treaty is referred to in the bill which the gentleman [Mr. JONES] has introduced, in section 1.

Mr. JONES. I may not have heard all the gentleman said. My attention was diverted.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. To be more specific, the Cagayan Sulu Islands embraced in the treaty of 1900 are located in the southwestern part of the Jolo Sea, sometimes called the Sulu Sea, and consist of Cagayan Sulu, the two Muligi Islands to the south of it, with Kinapusan, Pomelikan, Bintut, Bisu Bohan, Bohan, Mandah, and Lapun Lapun to the north.

These islands have seldom been visited and it is difficult to obtain accurate information concerning them. Admiral Keppel visited Cagayan Sulu in 1847. Sir Edward Belcher, and later an English traveler by the name of St. John, visited the islands and made some rather superficial investigations. Then the islands were visited last year by Congressman MILLER, who possesses, perhaps, more thorough and accurate information concerning them than has heretofore been published by any traveler or explorer.

It will be noticed that we purchased these islands just the same as we purchased Florida or Alaska. They were not a part of the Spanish War settlement. They came to us as the result of separate negotiations. It is important that we legislate respecting these small islands with intelligence. We should not act hurriedly and without thought. They belong to the United States. Our title to them is unquestioned. As guardians of the public domain—as conservationists, if you will—should we take the responsibility of quitclaiming away our title to these outlying islands in a blanket deed to the Filipinos without even ascertaining their value? It is generally believed now that England overlooked a trick—in fact, made a colossal blunder—when she parted with the title to the little island of Helgoland. We should not in the dying days of this session rush through a bill of such tremendous importance. This question should be faced squarely. We owe it to the people of our day as well as to those yet to come.

Congressman CLARENCE B. MILLER, who has explored these islands, says that Cagayan Sulu contains a wonderful harbor, which could with comparatively small expense be made one of the best harbors in the world. According to his statement what might be called the outer harbor is deep, with the exception of the entrance, where there is a formation of coral rock, which could easily be removed. Then, at a distance of 50 yards and at a height of 40 feet, there is an interlake containing fresh water. As there are no fresh water docks within thousands of miles its commercial value is apparent. Undoubtedly a big business could be done if the fresh-water lake were connected up by locks, so that the vessels of the nations could go there to have barnacles removed. It could be made a ship hospital, not only convenient, but profitable.

Cagayan Sulu Island seems to be about 8 miles long and 4 miles wide. Sibutu Island is about 14 miles long and 2 miles wide. The remaining islands are smaller. The soil and climate are said to be favorable to the cultivation of tobacco, sugar cane, hemp palm, yams, bananas, coconuts, and a variety of fruits and vegetables. Admiral Keppel, who visited Cagayan Sulu in 1847, says of it:

> Capt. Sir Edward Belcher, in describing his voyage in these seas, mentions having discovered in the south side of Cagayan Sulu a circular inlet of very deep water, cut off from the sea by a very shallow bar. Being very anxious to discover this fathomless basin, we kept a good lookout from the masthead, and a spot answering the description having been observed in passing it was determined to send an exploring party the next day.
> On the 17th we came to, in 10 fathoms, about a mile off the south side of Cagayan, and immediately commenced our examination of the curious circular lake before mentioned. The entrance is by a gap about 50 yards wide; this, however, is crossed by a bank of coral, which extends along the whole south coast and at low water is nearly dry, so as to exclude any boat larger than a canoe. On passing the bar we found ourselves inside a magnificent circular lake of deep blue water. Its circumference was about 3 miles. It was completely encircled by sandstone cliffs, upward of 200 feet in height and nearly perpendicular. Their sides were covered with trees and shrubs.

In sounding we found the depth of the water to vary from 50 to 60 fathoms, and it appeared to be as deep at the sides as in the center. Nothing could be more beautifully luxuriant than the growth of the jungle trees of every description their trunks and branches covered with an endless variety of beautiful creepers in brilliant blossom hanging in festoons to the very water's edge.

Forming ourselves into small parties, we dispersed, some to haul the seine, some to search for shells, while a third party explored the gap on the northeast side, clambering up without any anticipation of a further treat which was in reserve for them. At a height of about 40 feet another beautiful lake burst on their astonished sight, circular in form, and as nearly as possible similar to that which they had just left. The water of the higher or inner lake was perfectly fresh.

Guillemard, the naturalist, gives the idea that the island was originally colonized from Sulu and Borneo. He says:

With regard to the birds, the few species we collected or identified were interesting as showing the island to have been peopled with immigrants both from the Philippines and Borneo, though, as might be expected from its proximity, chiefly from the latter country.

Mr. Chairman, whether our country, in the event of the final granting of complete independence to the Filipinos, should retain the outlying islands in the Jolo Sea is perhaps one which should be settled in the future. If so, we should not at this time abridge the right of freedom of action. If section 1 of the bill and the preamble are passed as they are now written, our sovereignty in the outlying islands in the Jolo Sea will be surrendered.

ABSENT VOTER'S LAW.

Mr. Chairman, some of the gentlemen who sit before me have a worried look. There was a time when they hoped to at least get home for a couple of weeks before election day. Now they are worrying because there is some doubt about getting home even to vote. Not so the North Dakota delegation. While we would like to go home to take part in the political campaign now in progress, the problem of voting is already solved by our absent-voter's law, which will permit us to vote by mail if we are detained here by public business.

North Dakota has once more blazed the trail. Our State legislature passed an absent-voter's law during the session of 1913. At the primary election held in our State a couple of months ago many absent voters enjoyed the rare privilege of having their votes recorded. The wording of the law is very simple and fully safeguards the purity of the ballot. Every citizen who knows he will not be able to be at home on election day writes to the county auditor of his county for an absent-voters' ballot. He receives it by mail and mails it back to the auditor, who places it with the election supplies to be sent to his voting precinct. On the envelope is a short affidavit form wherein the voter makes oath that he has voted it in secret and that he has not been influenced in marking it by the officer before whom he took the oath. On election day the absent voter's name is entered on the voting registers and the ballot is deposited in the ballot box, the same as though he were personally present.

The absent-voter's law bears directly upon the question of compulsory voting laws. Many thoughtful people have hesitated to enact such laws. The large percentage of those who do not vote, however, which seems to be increasing by the returns from the primary elections in the different States, presents a real problem. Some do not vote because it is against their religion. They are, of course, excusable in a land of religious freedom. Others do not vote because of neglect. Then there is the class of conceited, self-satisfied, and superior-minded citizens who refuse to muddy themselves with what they call the sordidness of politics. Well, the country has in some way managed to live without their exercise of the right of franchise in the past, and may through a kind Providence be able to exist without them in the future. But there is a great class of our citizens, including railroad employees and traveling salesmen, who are unable to vote, and it would be a great injustice were the State to deprive them of their vote because of their inability to be at the polls. Our laws have hedged the polls about with many restrictions, regulations, and rules, made necessary, no doubt, by the desire to keep the ballot free and unstained by corruption, but which have acted in a measure to prevent a large number of voters from casting their ballots. Preeminent in this class are the traveling men, intelligent as few professions are as a whole; intensely interested in the great questions of the day; hearing those questions discussed and discussing them from every angle, as they must in their daily journeys; the first to note the effect of every new policy and law, touching elbows with all classes, as they do, and not circumscribed by a narrow horizon. How shall these men have an opportunity to express all they have learned in their journeyings across their territory when those very journeyings take them from home on election day? It would be difficult to overestimate the power of these men and the good they may do and actually accomplish in the State or Nation. We have the newspaper, telegraph, telephone, and their endless means of dissemination of the news, but these fall short of that personal contact that the traveling salesman alone can and does give. The merchant rising from a reading of his daily newspaper meets the knight of the grip at his door, and his first question is almost invariably, "What is the inside of this story in the paper concerning So-and-so?" And nine times in ten the personal opinion of the traveling salesman becomes unconsciously the personal opinion of one-half the men on his route.

We know and fully appreciate the power of the traveling salesmen in North Dakota. They have perhaps been unable to vote, but their opinion as they have traveled from town to town has settled grave questions for us, has elected and defeated men, and they have I am bound to say, always been on the side of honor and decency in politics. It was through their influence and activity that the legislature was induced to pass the law.

Already North Dakota has calls from all over the Union for copies of the law that statutes may be modeled after it for other States. It is of vital interest to every voter who finds it difficult to be at home on election day. For instance, the commuter from New Jersey to New York is interested. He wants to vote, but he can not take the day off from his business to do so. His own business or his employer's will not permit it. Yet if he can take the ballot in his home and, with his wife, deliberate upon it and mark it slowly and carefully—and not as men must on election day, in five minutes or less—do you judge he will vote with stupidity or thoughtlessness? He will not. It will be the better for the time and consideration he can give it. Then many thousands who live here at the Capital could vote, if absent-voter's laws were enacted in all the States. I see some faces of gentlemen in the press gallery who can not go home to vote without spending from $5 to $200, to say nothing about the loss of time.

North Dakota has once more taken its place in the vanguard of States in matters of legislation. It would never have done so, at least so far as the absent-voter's law is concerned, had it not within its borders a body of traveling men, smaller perhaps in numbers than that within most of the other States, but of a high moral standard, alert, intelligent, thoughtful, energetic, courageous, patriotic, and filled with an enthusiasm not only for business but for a government honestly and wisely administered.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further debate, the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if there is no further debate, I would like to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Chair stated that if there was no further debate the Clerk would read, and I certainly will not have the bill read under the five-minute rule with such a small number present.

Mr. JONES. I desire to yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I will withhold the point of order.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, a sliding scale is doubtless a useful thing in various operations. It is not quite so desirable in the size of the audience here, and particularly is it undesirable when you find yourself allowed 1 minute or 60 minutes, just as the scale may stand at the time you are permitted to speak. It may interfere somewhat with the intelligence and continuity of your address and militate against its utility.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman was saying something about the smallness of the audience. Does the gentleman understand this is simply a "baker's" dozen we have here now? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BAKER. I am doubtful whether there are that many.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, the preamble in the bill is a clear statement of the reasons and objects of the proposed legislation.

No one has taken definite issue with either; only as to the propriety of the formality.

The proponents of the bill seek to expedite the qualification of the Philippine people for self-government by extending to them every facility to acquire adjustment and aptitude in the processes, and fortitude in the maintenance of orderly, free, and autonomous government.

Ultimate executive dominance, or sovereignty, alone is withheld, awaiting only their preparedness to take over the control and conduct of their own government.

The opposition never say what they intend to do; they know the American people are in a false and insecure position in this Asiatic business, but they do not indicate a firm or definite purpose to get away from it, even on terms highly favorable to our trade, commerce, and defense.

They are only, like the Irishman, "Agin the Government." They would treat the Philippine people as they did the infant industries in the tariff—keep up the nursing and keep on the swaddling clothes until they are hoary headed, and then still nurse and swaddle and exploit them. [Applause.]

We hope to accelerate their attainment of maturity in self-governing faculty by giving them an opportunity to try. We want peace and progress and self-government everywhere. [Applause.]

We have enough to do to mind our own business and keep our house in order without and instead of nosing around the world like some Nebuchadnezzar or Darius or Alexander or Cæsar, or other despotizers, to get more provinces and to quarrel and contend with people about whose evolution and habits and prejudices and emotions we know nothing.

If we want to be political missionaries we might take lessons from Mahomet, who did a land-office business in that line. But it is doubtful if we could ever appreciate the ethics or circumvallate the periphery of his system.

We talk about the science of politics. Europe has always been crowded with professors of that science, and they have made a mess of it.

They have turned a paradise into a shambles. They have covered their hills and strewn their valleys with dead men and have turned their rivers red with the blood of their young men, the hope of the nations. [Applause.]

George Washington had more scientific sense in his unscientific head than all the professors of the science of politics, from Machiavelli down to this grim day.

War is absurd. It shows the veil between civilization and barbarism is the thinnest thing on earth. And yet and also war is the price of the denial of equal rights among men, and that denial is about the only possible justification of the crime of war. [Applause.]

Covetousness is an original moral disease of the first magnitude and most universal prevalence, and its restraint has engaged the devoted attention of good and true men in all ages.

There never was a thief who was not covetous; he wanted that which belonged to another, and being a specialist and less scrupulous and more subtle or stronger than his victim, he exercised his faculties.

It is the same with nations as it is with individuals; no more, no less. A big thief is not entitled to consideration on account of the size of the loot.

The most valuable possession men have is freedom, the right to govern themselves. When that is taken away nothing remains but sordid, spiritless servitude. [Applause.]

"All just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed." We said that when we were oppressed. Do we say that now when are able to oppress others? Civil institutions are purely concessionary.

George III declared that he did not dare withdraw his Government from the American Colonies because if he did they would fall into anarchy and destroy each other.

He was an altruist, and a conscientious one at that. All that ailed him was a lack of education and better information on the limitations of his junior partnership with the Almighty in the matter of his divine right to govern men. The democracy of the United Kingdom of Great Britain has elucidated that question.

No despot ever lived who did not believe, including those of us who are disposed to despotize, that he was the best friend the people ever had, and that they needed him every hour.

It is always a case of felonious force or hypocritical bighead, and it seems few are immune who have a chance to practice the transparent fraud.

Our government in the Philippines was superimposed by force; it continues by force, and it can not live without force. [Applause.]

A pretty business for real men, American men at that, to be engaged in. If the fathers of the Republic, from Samuel Adams and George Washington down, knew it, they would hide their faces for shame, and they would cry out in anguish, "How sharper than a serpent's tooth is an ungrateful child." [Applause.]

Some say we got the Philippines by accident. An honest man does not keep that which belongs to another and which he acquired by accident or force. [Applause.]

It is said that this is not the time to vindicate the dependableness of our word of honor, when Europe is stark mad with slaughter and the burning of the homes of the people and the destruction of the monuments of civilization. [Applause.]

On the contrary, this is the time of all times to set a light in the firmament that all the world may see that there is one nation the essence of whose profession is the perfection of its performance and that good faith and self-government are the hope of the world. [Applause.]

We are dallying with triple serpents—pride, deceit, and covetousness—and we will get stung. [Applause.]

We call it altruism; it is "all-folly-ism." [Applause.] Let us quit talking about the square deal and engage in the "fair-do" [applause] with all men, and the whole world will say, "There is the truthteller, the fair doer, your real Uncle Sam." [Applause.]

This bill is saturated with honor; it rings with righteousness [applause]; it is clothed with freedom. [Applause.] Adopt it and we will once more know the ecstacy of a good conscience. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER] has consumed 15 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield back the balance of his time?

Mr. BAKER. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 13811. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad if the House would consent to let me take the Senate bridge bill from the Speaker's table and consider it.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentlemen always indicate the character of the speeches they wish to insert?

Mr. HELGESEN. My remarks are on the effect of legislation on the business of the country.

The SPEAKER. The effect of legislation on the business of the country. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANTOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Philippine bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT ST. PAUL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate bill——

Mr. ADAMSON. There is an identical House bill on the calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will bring that up the first thing in the morning.

Mr. ADAMSON. I never can get a chance to do it in the morning. There is always a row. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Why not take it up this evening? It is not 5 o'clock yet.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a bill of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS]. It is not my bill.

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state where the bridge is to be constructed?

Mr. ADAMSON. Away out in the West. Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota is responsible for it.

Mr. MOORE. That is a pretty broad expanse.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is a pretty good bridge. I would not let it hurt navigation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 6440) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Paul, Minn.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is an old bridge, and it needs to be repaired, and they need to have authority to do it. It is a reconstructed bridge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and their successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in the east half of the southwest quarter of section 12, township 28 north, range 23 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the city of St. Paul, county of Ramsey, and State of Minnesota, to replace the bridge and approaches there located, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, a corresponding House bill (H. R. 18607) was laid on the table.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent that 30 minutes of the time remaining for general debate may be used at the conclusion of the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule instead of at the end of general debate.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean there shall be 30 minutes of general debate at the conclusion of the five-minute debate?

Mr. JONES. It is to be taken from the time that has been fixed upon for general debate.

The SPEAKER. But it is to be used at the end?

Mr. JONES. To be used at the end of the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] requests that 30 minutes of the time for general debate which has been allotted shall be subtracted, in the first instance, from general debate, and that general debate for 30 minutes be permitted at the end of the discussion under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, first I would like to inquire how much time now remains for general debate, if the gentleman can inform the House?

Mr. JONES. I think there is about an hour and a half remaining; and I will say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who is the ranking member of the minority, desires, as well as myself, that this be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman's request contemplate 30 minutes on each side?

Mr. JONES. No; 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that general debate to be limited to the bill?

Mr. JONES. Limited to the bill, of course.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is rather an unusual request to have general debate after a bill is concluded. Does the gentleman mean after the passage of the bill?

Mr. JONES. I mean after the bill has been considered under the five-minute rule for amendment. Then there is to be this 30 minutes of debate, 15 minutes on each side. I will say to the gentleman this was not my suggestion.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the chairman to say that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] has agreed to that?

Mr. JONES. Judge TOWNER has agreed to this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Now, the understanding is that 30 minutes of the general debate under the rule shall be subtracted therefrom and shall be used after the five-minute debate is over, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] having 15 minutes of the 30 minutes and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] having 15 minutes, and the debate is to be on the bill?

Mr. JONES. To make the matter perfectly plain, Mr. Speaker, the understanding is that 15 minutes is to be taken from the time remaining to the majority and 15 minutes from the time remaining to the minority and to be controlled as the time is now controlled.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, October 2, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SHREVE: A bill (H. R. 19060) to establish a standard basket for grapes when packed in baskets, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 19061) for the relief of homestead entrymen under the reclamation projects of the United States; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. BEALL of Texas: A bill (H. R. 19062) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 362) to correct an error in the enrollment of certain Indians enumerated in Senate Document No. 478, Sixty-third Congress, second session, enacted into law in the Indian appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey: Resolution (H. Res. 633) authorizing the Doorkeeper to employ additional help; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BAILEY: A bill (H. R. 19063) granting an increase of pension to Robert M. Skillington; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 19064) granting an increase of pension to Solomon H. Foster; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DONOHOE: A bill (H. R. 19065) granting a pension to Jennie Allen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 19066) granting a pension to Annie Welsh; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McGILLICUDDY: A bill (H. R. 19067) granting an increase of pension to Cordelia Briggs; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19068) granting an increase of pension to Dorcas M. Watkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN: A bill (H. R. 19069) granting a pension to Mary Kimball; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19070) granting an increase of pension to Edward C. Thompson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUPLEY: A bill (H. R. 19071) granting an increase of pension to Charles U. Burns; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 19072) granting an increase of pension to Zachary Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland: A bill (H. R. 19073) granting a pension to Howard E. Tolson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WINGO: A bill (H. R. 19074) granting an increase of pension to James Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of sundry citizens of New Mexico, favoring certain amendments to existing mining laws; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CARY: Petition of the First National Bank of West Allis, Wis., protesting against revenue tax on bank capital and surplus; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Petition of Pittsburgh Oil Refining Co., protesting against tax on petroleum; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAYDEN: Petition of Theodore A. Woodruff, favoring certain amendments to existing mining laws; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. J. I. SENATE.

FRIDAY, October 2, 1914.

(Legislative day of Monday, September 28, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a proposed amendment to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and that it may be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

AUTOTRUCKS FOR POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution, and I ask for its consideration. I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 459), as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and hereby is, directed to send to the Senate at the earliest possible date all information in his possession or in the possession of the Post Office Department in any manner bearing upon the action of the department inviting the manufacturers of autotrucks, some time prior to the 8th day of September, 1914, to submit bids for supplying such trucks for the use of said department.

Such information to include the department's invitation to bidders; copies or originals of the respective bids received; the action of the department in forming a committee to pass upon the bids; how, by whom appointed, and under what instructions the committee acted, as well as the names of the individuals composing said committee; the full report of the committee, and the reasons for its award of contract or contracts to other than the lowest responsible bidder, if such awards were made, and all correspondence or facts that will tend to give the fullest possible information regarding this transaction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over for a day. The Senate resumes the consideration of the conference report on House bill 15657.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Page	Swanson
Bryan	Lane	Perkins	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Thompson
Chilton	McCumber	Reed	Thornton
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Robinson	Townsend
Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fletcher	Myers	Sheppard	West
Gore	Norris	Shively	White
Gronna	O'Gorman	Simmons
Hughes	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
James	Overman	Smoot

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. STERLING, Mr. WALSH, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. MCLEAN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] are necessarily absent. The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. STONE and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I voted for this bill as it passed the Senate. I voted for the Trade Commission bill. I voted for the conference report on the Trade Commission bill. While I voted for this particular bill as it passed the Senate, I was not by any means satisfied with the bill as it passed the Senate. I voted for a great many amendments that were defeated, and I voted to keep in the bill some of the House provisions that were taken out by the Senate. The House bill had some very good provisions in it that were taken out by the Senate; the Senate bill, as it passed, had some excellent provisions; so that out of the House bill and the Senate bill, if we had kept in what was good in both, we should have had a good law. In my judgment, the conferees in the main have kept in what was bad in both bills, and we have now but very little of good in the conference bill. The conferees have taken the House bill and the Senate bill, and out of them have drafted a new measure. In the shape of a conference report, that bill is now before the Senate, and we must vote for it as an entirety or against it as an entirety. There is no possibility now of amending it; but in my opposition to this conference report, and my determination to vote against it, I think I have already shown that such a conclusion reached by me has not been arrived at because I am opposed to this kind of legislation. I am not willing to admit that a vote against the conference report means that there will be no trust legislation. A vote against the conference report and its defeat means that the report will go back to conference and that we may ultimately get a good bill.

The conference bill has taken out practically all of the teeth of the legislation. It is a milk-and-water proposition, as I look at it. While it contains some good, even though I believed a defeat of the conference bill would mean no trust legislation at this session of Congress, I would rather take that responsibility and defeat it than to have the bill passed in its present form.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] has argued that if we do not pass this conference bill the probabilities are there will now be no trust legislation. If we do pass the conference bill, then the cry will go out that this Congress has legislated on the trust question, and it will perhaps be a generation before additional legislation will be had. If we defeat this conference bill, the issue will still be before the American people, and in the end I believe we shall get good legislation.

Mr. President, I believe this conference bill is a fraud and a sham. If it is enacted into law in its present form, it will have the appearance of having passed through John D. Rockefeller's Sunday-school class, rather than through the Congress of the United States. If this bill becomes a law in this form, it will be the greatest victory of a legislative nature that has been won by the trusts and combinations within the lifetime of any man here.

Section 2 of the bill as it passed the other House was in part as follows:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall either directly or indirectly discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The conference bill, instead of that section, contains the following provision:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States.

It will be noted that the criminal provision is stricken out, and that the conferees have simply in this section made a declaration that it shall be unlawful for these practices to be indulged in, without providing any penalty for their prohibition.

Mr. President, the iniquity that this section seeks to cover is one of the worst that has been in existence in our country. It is one of the principal means by which great trusts and combinations have been built up, and by which enormous fortunes have been made at the expense of the consuming public. It was the main method by which the Standard Oil Co. gained its wealth and its power; it is a means of discrimination that is paralyzing, that means death and destruction to honest business. The Standard Oil Co. and similar trusts that indulge in this practice have been in the habit of going into some community where they had some competition and there, regardless of cost or of anything else, underselling their competitor until they had driven him out of business. When they had driven him out of business or got him in such condition that they were able to buy him out, then the price was raised in that community. While it was often lowered in one community, it was raised in other communities; so that they could make up their losses and a profit besides. It has been one of the most sinful practices; and the road to these great combinations that have won wealth and power by this means has been strewn all along with the dead and withering bones of honest business, sacrificed in an honest attempt to make an honest living. In the end the consuming public has always been compelled to foot the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator recognizes the fact that the Senate struck out this section entirely, does he not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator, then, surely is not criticizing the conferees for compromising and putting something in?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am finding fault with the different provisions that were left out of the bill, no matter where they were left out.

Mr. OVERMAN. This was left out by the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senate struck it out, but it was before the conferees.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but the Senate having stricken it out, it became necessary for the conferees on the part of the Senate to insist on it staying out. Is not that true?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Senator from West Virginia yesterday argued that proposition along this line: He said the Senate had stricken out all, I believe, but one of the criminal provisions that were contained in the House bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the whole section was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but this was only one of the criminal provisions, and the Senator from West Virginia said that in the one section, where the Senate had left in the House provision containing a criminal clause, the act to which that penalty attached was not so great a crime as the act concerning which the criminal penalty was stricken out, and therefore they felt that they ought even to surrender the one which the Senate had left in. It seems to me that the proper view to take is this: That if the Senate kept in a criminal provision attaching to a minor offense it would follow, as a matter of course, that the Senate would favor a criminal provision for a greater offense.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator will recognize the fact that the fight in the Senate raged about section 2, and after a long discussion, probably for two days—I do not remember whether the Senator protested against leaving it out or not——

Mr. NORRIS. I voted against leaving it out.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate, after a vote, struck it out, and then the conferees on the part of the Senate were met with the proposition as to whether they would stand by what the Senate had done, and, the House standing by their action, whether we could agree to a compromise on this matter and secure the best compromise which it was possible to obtain. So, certainly the Senator will not criticize the Senate conferees.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to get the idea that in anything I shall say I intend to make any personal criticism against anybody.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not. I have no personal feeling in this matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that thoroughly, Mr. President, and I know the Senator is always fair; but he has been on conference committees; he has been in the House a long time, and he knows how these matters are arranged between the conferees. They try to arrive at some compromise, if possible; and he knows that the conferees were met with the proposition that the Senate had refused to reinstate section 2.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senate conferees did not have to refuse to do it. The Senate conferees could have yielded; they might have come back to the Senate for instructions; they might have done various things; but they did probably what they thought was right, and I am going to do what I think is right.

I think this provision ought to have remained in the bill and the other criminal provisions that were stricken out ought also to have remained, and I expect to be able to show that the Senator from North Carolina is bound by a greater pledge—perhaps not a greater pledge than I am, but a greater pledge than binds a good many Senators on this side of the Chamber—to keep these very provisions in the bill.

Mr. President, this particular provision is a sample of some of the others. We have taken out the teeth of this provision. We have done nothing more than to declare that this practice is wrong; we have taken away the penalty. As I think I shall show further on, there are but two ways in which we can successfully break down trusts, and the enactment and enforcement of criminal provisions is one of those two ways. I am dealing now with that particular part of it. We have taken away the penalty. Any man who has had any experience either as a legislator or as an attorney at the bar knows that when a statute is passed and no penalty is attached it is not much better than though the space it occupies on the paper were left blank.

These crimes, or these practices, which would be crimes if this provision of the House bill were enacted into law, are not committed by the common people; these practices have not been laid at the door and can not be laid at the door of the ordinary citizen. They are indulged in by the powerful and the wealthy; they are the practices of millionaires, and many millionaires have been made by practices of that kind—by the contributions in pennies of the struggling poor of our country.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. And do not forget that every time a millionaire has been made by that process scores of independent men, with a competency before them, have been reduced to little better than poverty.

Mr. NORRIS. That is absolutely true. Not only were these contributions made by the struggling poor, but, as the Senator from Minnesota well suggests, other men engaged in honest business were robbed of what they had honestly acquired by pursuing an honest business. So it is said to this kind of criminals—and, although there is no statutory law that has made them criminals, in the eyes of humanity and in the eyes of God I believe they are the worst criminals outside of jail—we say by this law to them, "This practice which you have been following is wrong; you must not indulge in it any more; keep the ill-gotten gains that you have made, but do not practice on this community this kind of a business any longer; you can go to another community and do it over again if you want to; you can start in some other business and perform the same kind of a trick on the same community if you want to, but when we catch you at it we will tell you to stop; it is not right. Why, here is a statute, a regular Sunday-school statute, passed by the Congress, that says that it is not right to do this." So they leave those fields and go into new ones, but the poor fellow who is out of a job—perhaps driven out of a job by this very kind of practice—and who steals a loaf of bread to feed his starving children must go to prison now as heretofore; the easy-going colored man who robs a henroost must go to jail, but the millionaire who robs a community is patted on the back and is told to go and sin no more. It seems to me that that does not exaggerate the condition in which this law is going to place the country.

The Senator from West Virginia said yesterday that if all men were a good and as honest as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] he would be in favor of repealing the law against murder, because he said the Senator from Minnesota could not commit murder if he would and would not if he could; he was so constituted that he could not commit such a crime. To have been consistent he ought to have said: "Inasmuch as there are some men like the Senator from Minnesota who are honest and square, and who have to pay their proportionate part in the way of taxes for enforcing the criminal laws, therefore we will repeal the law of murder, and in its place we will enact a statute which says that it is wrong to commit murder, and we will turn it over to a commission; and when a man gets into the murdering business we will send the commission out, and we will tell him, 'Here, the law says it is wrong; you must stop, and if you do not stop we will go into court and get an injunction against you, preventing you from committing any more crimes.'"

Mr. President, what can be said by our Democratic brethren in defense of this provision? In the last campaign from every stump was proclaimed the doctrine, "Make the guilt personal." In every platform something was said about criminal prosecutions for the trust magnates. "Put the trust magnates behind the bars," was your slogan. We heard it everywhere. You criticized everybody else who had been in power because they had not done that very thing. I had a good deal of sympathy with the criticism. I made some of it myself. But you said: "Put us in power and we will prosecute criminally these violators of the antitrust law."

In your national platform for 1912, adopted at Baltimore, you had this plank:

A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal as well as the civil law against trusts and trust officials, and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States.

In redemption of that pledge now you are going to say to the trusts, "It is wrong to do this; you must not do it any more."

Another plank in the same platform was as follows:

We condemn the action of the Republican administration in compromising with the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust, and its failure to invoke the criminal provisions of the antitrust law against the officers of those corporations after the court had declared that from the undisputed facts in the record they had violated the criminal provisions of the law.

There is a statement from your platform that these men were practically found guilty of violating the criminal statutes of the country, and demanding that they be prosecuted. You have held complete control of the reins of this Government for nearly two years, and not one of those criminals that you denounced your opponents for not prosecuting has been arrested or indicted, nor has any attempt been made anywhere to prosecute them for the violation of law that you say in your platform has already been proven and demonstrated. Does that look like good faith?

Now, let us see further. You said in the last plank of that same platform:

Our pledges are made to be kept when in office as well as relied upon during the campaign.

It seems to me it is up to you particularly—and when I say it is up to you I do not mean that the responsibility is all off of everybody else—but you have a particular obligation here and a particular duty here to redeem a pledge that you solemnly made in order to get into office.

But, Mr. President, so that it may not be thought for a moment that that plank in the platform was "slipped in" or got in by some circuitous route, like it was claimed some other planks got in, I want to read what the President said about the platform pledges. This has been read several times before, and I do not know but that I ought to apologize for reading from the Democratic platform and charging that it has been violated by Democrats since they have come into office. Perhaps I ought to apologize for it, because these violations are getting to be chestnuts. There is not anything particularly left of the platform that has not been violated. At the present time I can only think of one plank, and that is the plank that pledged the candidate for President not to be a candidate for reelection. That has not been violated yet. Mr. Wilson, while a candidate, speaking in New Jersey on the 5th day of August, 1912, said:

Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

With that statement by the leader, the man who is still the leader, that this platform means business, how can a Democrat consistently vote now to practically free all these trusts from future prosecution and to liberate them from criminal prosecution when your very pledge was to the contrary?

But, Mr. President, there was another great Democratic leader who had something to say about platform pledges. Mr. Bryan, speaking before the legislature at Harrisburg, Pa., on the 13th day of May, 1913, used this language:

A representative who secures office on platform pledges and then betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than any embezzler of money.

That is not my language. That is the language of your leader. That is the proposition, it seems to me, that ought to be in the mind of every Democrat before he votes to do what I believe to be a repudiation of a platform pledge made for the purpose of securing votes.

Mr. Bryan says, further:

It cost vast sums of money, it cost the lives of the best men in the world, to secure a representative form of government. Those fortunes and that blood was spent in vain if representatives, after their election, are to be permitted to betray and defy the people and trample their platform pledges under foot.

Again, he says:

I certainly would have no man violate his conscience. But his conscience ought to commence working before his election. Because he will not violate his conscience, is that any excuse for violating his platform? Such a man ought to violate neither his conscience nor his platform.

Now, see what he says he ought to do—he is telling you:

He ought to resign and let some man take his place whose conscience does not revolt against keeping platform pledges.

Why, Mr. President, if that statement were enacted into law, if it were followed out, there would not be a quorum either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate. That is not all, Mr. President. There would have been a vacancy before this in the White House, and the man who occupies the presiding officer's chair in this Chamber would now be President of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, in all of that memorable campaign one of the principal things that I heard was the denunciation of the methods by which those in office had permitted trust magnates to escape. From every platform, from the very housetops, was proclaimed the doctrine that the guilt of trust magnates must be made criminal, the same as that of the man who steals a horse or robs a store. That was the pledge. That was the doctrine. Why, you seemed then to be imbued with a sort of a "knock-down-and-drag-out" spirit. You seemed to be working along the lines of a "swallow-'em-whole, eat-'em-alive" inclination. It almost seemed as though every Democratic campaigner must eat and swallow whole before breakfast every morning at least one ordinary-sized trust in order to keep himself in good physical condition. Your doctrine was that if you were put into power you were going to compel these men to look through the bars. You promised it to the people. But now, when you are in office and have the power, you are suddenly smitten with heart failure. You become merciful now to the men that you before condemned and whose practices you said you would make criminal; you pat them on the back now, and say, "I will forgive the past. Go, and sin no more."

Why, you were a good deal like a regular Sherlock Holmes when it came to punishing Republican lawbreakers, but you have become a band of Sunday-school superintendents when it comes to looking after Democratic lawbreakers.

Much more might be said about the particular practice that the particular section about which I am now talking would have remedied had it been enacted into law as it passed the House. If there was anything wrong about it, if there was something to be changed, if something can be pointed out that ought to be different, the conferees had power to make the change; but what you have done is that you have extracted every tooth and left nothing here of any value.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I will.

Mr. CLAPP. The way that section was finally fixed by the conferees there would have been no gum for the tooth to have been embedded in; because, outside of conference, outside of the action of the two Houses, they inserted this:

Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition—

Not at the point where the small independent was crushed out, but in the world-wide operations of a trust whose operations encircle the globe.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Consequently, with that added, there could be no offense under section 2, because the crushing out of a man in one town would not even tend to affect the business of a world-wide operation.

I trust the Senator from Nebraska will dwell on that before he leaves section 2.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota is very well taken. I want to say just a word now that his suggestion reminds me of, and that refers to the clause which provides that it shall be unlawful to practice the things I have enumerated—

Where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Take the question of competition. Why, Mr. President, where the practices that this section seeks to deal with are engaged in, it is competition that does the business. It is the ruinous, unconscionable, and what ought to be the unlawful, competition that drives honest men out of business. It is the competition that means in the end higher prices to the consumer. Then of what use is it to say, "This section shall not apply unless it tends to lessen competition"? Why, at the time the mischief is being done there is greater competition than there ever was at any other time.

And then there is this word "substantially," but I will not take up that now, because it comes in later in another place in the bill, and I intend to discuss it at some length.

Section 3 of the bill as it passed the House was as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for the owner, operator, or transporter of the product or products of any mine, oil or gas well, reduction works, refinery, of hydroelectric plant producing coal, oil, gas, or hydroelectric energy, or for any person controlling the products thereof, engaged in selling such product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and any person violating this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished as provided in the preceding section.

The preceding section is the one that I read before, which was stricken out; and the penalty there is a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Now, this section 3 is entirely out and nothing is put in its place. In my judgment, Mr. President, the evil that is sought to be covered by section 3, that criminal section, while a great one, is not near as sinful, not near as disastrous, not near as wicked as the one that is sought to be covered by section 2, a practice that every man, woman, and child in the United States knows has been engaged in by practically every trust that has been engaged in mercantile and commercial business, and of which the Standard Oil Co. is a shining light. But nothing is given us in place of this section. The practice is not even declared illegal. The fellow can follow this practice and there will be no men to come along and pat him on the back and tell him he must not do it any more. He can not only keep what he has stolen in the past, but he can keep on stealing in the future.

Section 4 of the House bill was stricken out in the Senate, and what was section 2 of the Senate bill was passed in its stead. This section reads as follows as it passed the Senate:

SEC. 2. That it shall not be lawful to insert or incorporate a condition in any contract relating to the sale or lease of or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, or the effect of which will be to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire from the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees any article or class of articles not protected by the patent; and any such conditions shall be null and void, as being in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy. Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The conferees struck out that provision and in its place have inserted the following:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce in the course of such commerce to lease or make a sale or contract for sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities, whether patented or unpatented, for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price on the condition, agreement, or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Again, Mr. President, in the conference bill every tooth is taken out; everything that might offend the most tender conscience of any trust magnate whoever lived is excluded. Again, this applies, as does section 2, to men of great wealth. Here is a crime that the Senate sought to saddle on men guilty of what I believe everyone will concede to be the most obnoxious and most wicked and most sinful practice, a crime; and here again the conferees have taken the sting out of it and said, "It is unlawful to do this. You must not do this if it tends to substantially lessen competition; but if you do do it, all we do is to tell you to stop. There is no crime. The criminal provision is taken away. There shall be no penalty. We will put you in the same class with the other trust magnate who has built up his enormous machine and his enormous power and his enormous wealth by unfair methods of competition by driving men out of business. We will put you in a class with him, because you belong to the same class. You are both millionaires. No poor man can engage in this kind of business. It applies only to the rich. We will take away the criminal penalty. We will violate the Democratic platform pledge given to the people upon which Democrats were elected to office, and we will simply declare this illegal and let the rich man go. The poor devil who is engaged in stealing because he is hungry or committing petty crimes can still be sent to jail and punished, but you are above that kind of punishment. We will turn you over to some fellows who will say to you, 'Keep what you have; keep your ill-gotten gains; but do not do it any more.'"

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the language upon which he is now commenting does not stop with the expression "where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition," but there are words following which give to the language "to substantially lessen competition" a very much greater scope than they would have if it were not for the following words. The words I refer to are "in any line of commerce."

As I interpret that section, it would not be enough to show under it that competition had been lessened in a certain locality—that some individual had been put out of business—but you would have to show that the lessening of competition had been substantial; and, of course, whether it was substantial or not would depend, under the language of this section, upon whether the lessening of competition was a substantial lessening of competition in the whole line of business, not in some neighborhood, not in some community, not as to some individual, but a substantial lessening of competition in the entire trade in that line of business.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Accordingly, if the Standard Oil were to adopt such a system of contract, and if they were brought to the Trade Commission upon a charge that they had substantially lessened competition in that line of business, the question the court would have to determine would be whether the putting out of business of a particular individual in a community or of one rival in a town had substantially lessened the whole field of competition that was embraced in the line of trade now pursued by the Standard Oil; and, as the business is world-wide and as hundreds of millions of dollars of business is done every year, they would be able to say that the crushing of one rival in one town or the crushing of all rivals in a town had not substantially lessened the competition in that entire line of business.

It seems to me that when the words "to substantially lessen competition in any line of business" were inserted it was done with the express purpose of requiring something more than the destruction of an individual to be proven, but it was to require proof amounting to a restraint of trade, not as to a community, but possibly as to the entire country.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I do not think there is any doubt about it. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. REED. There is another section here somewhere that has a line in it which emphasizes this. That section states "in any section or community." That is not the language which is applied here.

Mr. NORRIS. No; this is "in any line of commerce," which covers the whole country. Of course it means, in my judgment, merely nothing. In practical effect it would be impossible even if you attached the penalty to make out a case under the law, because the fact that a man is ruined and driven out of business in a town does not affect the trade in thousands of other towns all over the country, which would have to be proven before even the commission could tell him that he was doing wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The attempt on the part of the American Sugar Refining Co. to undersell the regular market quotations of sugar in the Missouri Valley was intended to cripple the development of the sugar industry in that valley. It had purely a local effect. The prices were lowered there, and what they did did not tend to substantially come under the requirement of this proposed law.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but that very practice that the Senator mentions was indulged in, and it ruined some men who were engaged in the beet-sugar business. That is the same practice that I spoke of awhile ago coming under section 2 that the Standard Oil built itself upon, and it would have been covered if section 2 of the House bill had been enacted into law.

This particular section about which I am now talking was intended to make illegal the tying contracts that we have heard about a great deal. For instance, the Dick Co. had a patent to a very valuable and unique method of duplicating writing or typewriting, making a large number of copies from one copy. They had a patent on it, and to almost all men in all lines of business and professions it was a great help—almost a necessity—and there was a great demand for it. It is conceded that the men owning the patent and owning the article could charge what price they wanted to; it was theirs. But what did they do? They named a certain price, and then provided that the purchaser must use a certain kind of material with it, such as ink, paper, and so forth. They could have included everything that they wanted to of that kind. They could have, perhaps, gone far enough to provide that it must be operated by a girl with red hair. There was not any limit to the extent to which they could go. The men who wanted this machine, who needed paper to use in it, could go out on the street and buy paper wherever they pleased.

Mr. WEST rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment; let me finish this thought. They could use any material they could get anywhere not patented, but by this kind of a tying contract they prohibited the use of anything except what they sold and what they named in their contract.

This section was intended to make that illegal and to make it a crime, but in the way it has been doctored up by the conference committee it is declared illegal under certain conditions, and those conditions, as the Senator from Missouri has pointed out, are so difficult to establish that it would be a practical impossibility for them ever to prove it before the commission. But the worst part of it all is that they have taken away the criminal provision. There is not anything left in it that will have a tendency to make men have any respect for it. It is in reality a dead letter.

The bill as it passed the Senate, in section 4, contained the following language:

SEC. 4. That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

Now, the conferees have added a proviso to that provision that says:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity now pending in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

The real effect of that proviso is to make the section inapplicable to cases in which consent judgments have been taken in cases where pleas of guilty have been entered by the defendant. Why should a judgment rendered upon a plea of guilty be any different from a judgment rendered upon a trial where the evidence was taken? If there is any difference, it is in favor of the plea of guilty, judgment being accepted as true, because the defendant admits it and has never contested it.

Mr. President, the Government commences suit against a corporation, charging it with violation of the antitrust law. That suit may run along for two or three years and be fought bitterly; there may be some doubt, there may be an honest doubt, as to whether or not the defendant trust is guilty; but when the Government commences a prosecution against a great trust or against a trust magnate, and they or he come into court and plead guilty, is there any doubt of their guilt? Is there any question about it? Do you suppose they would admit guilt if it were not true? Do you suppose they would plead guilty unless they knew that the Government had the proof and was going to substantiate its case and that it would get a verdict of a jury finding them guilty? The statement of the proposition, it seems to me, is its answer.

Then, why should consent judgments be excluded? Why should the private citizen be required to go to the trouble, the expense, and the delay of traveling over the country to hunt up the evidence in a case that he had commenced against a trust when the trust had already been in court and admitted the truth of the allegations? Why put the citizen to that burden?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. I hardly know how to characterize the phase of the matter that I am going to suggest; I would not think of humor in connection with so serious a subject, but the incongruity, the ludicrous character of the matter manifests itself when we realize that the trust can always thereafter plead its confession as an estoppel, and the people who have been injured by the trust can not use that judgment in a suit against the trust.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that would be true. If any litigation arose in which it would be advantageous for the trust to plead this very judgment rendered on a plea of guilty or an agreement or a consent, it could do so, of course. Everybody knows—and that is the reason for this section—that it is an extremely difficult matter, almost an impossibility, for a private individual to go to the expense of litigating with one of these monstrous institutions. If you will follow some of the cases in which the Government has been engaged, if you have observed that it has taken a year or two years to get the evidence, and that the Government's attorneys have traveled from one end of the country to the other taking evidence at various places, you will realize the difficulty an individual of but ordinary means would have if he undertook to prosecute that kind of an institution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that, while it is difficult in any lawsuit to do what the Senator suggests, I know of one case in my own State where an individual citizen sued the American Tobacco Co.—he was not worth any money, either, they having destroyed his business—and he recovered threefold damages and all his costs.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, that was good. I presume there are instances of that kind; but there are thousands of other cases where men have given up because they did not have the financial ability to follow these gigantic trusts through the various details which were necessary in the litigation. There might be an instance where the evidence would all be in one place and where it would be easy to obtain it.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the instance which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] suggests and the other instance which comes to my mind, in which an individual sued what is called the Sugar Trust and recovered, I think, some $3,000,000, are the most effectual means of enforcing the Sherman antitrust law, in my judgment, that we could possibly have. One of the ways in which we could strengthen the Sherman antitrust law is by making it more available to the private individual than it now is.

I rose, however, to ask, Is there any instance now in which an individual may avail himself of these judgments except in a case which is hereafter tried and contested? As I understand, it is limited alone to that class of cases. I may be in error, but the language is:

That a final judgment or decree hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States—

Of course, if that stood alone in all cases, whether they were consent judgments or otherwise, the individual could avail himself of the judgment as prima facie proof; but it eliminates from that the following:

That this judgment shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken.

Not to judgments or decrees entered by consent heretofore, but any that are entered in the future, I take it, by consent are eliminated.

Mr. NORRIS. But if the Senator will notice the first part of the section, it reads——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From what section is the Senator from Idaho reading?

Mr. BORAH. From section 5.

Mr. NORRIS. It reads "that a final judgment or decree hereafter rendered."

Mr. BORAH. Yes; "in any criminal prosecution."

Mr. NORRIS. So that it would not apply to any judgment that had been rendered heretofore.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. Not only that, but it does not apply to all judgments hereafter rendered, but only to those rendered in contested cases.

Mr. NORRIS. That is absolutely true. Judgments that are hereafter rendered, in order to have them apply, must have been contested judgments.

Mr. BORAH. Then we are narrowed by the provisions of this section to one class of judgments alone, so far as using them as prima facie proof is concerned, and that is to judgments hereafter rendered when there is an actual contest or trial.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. President, section 6, as it passed the Senate, read in part as follows—I shall not read all of the section, but I will read that part of section 6 which has been modified by the conferees. It is:

SEC. 6. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Instead of that language, the conferees adopted the following language:

SEC. 7. That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce, where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition.

It will be noticed that practically the only change made is to interject into the law the word "substantially." Under the bill, as it passed the Senate this was made illegal "if the effect of such acquisition may be to lessen competition," and so forth. Under the bill as reported by the conferees, it reads "the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition"; in other words, it would require additional proof, if we were going to offer proof under such a law, to substantiate an allegation under the bill as reported by the conferees, over and above the requirement reported in the bill as passed by the Senate.

I want to consider, in connection with that part of the section, another part, where practically the same change is used and where it applies to holding companies. The bill in the section, as it passed the Senate, provided as follows:

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired.

The conferees have reported this language:

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any of them—

This section applies, and is intended to apply, to the case of one corporation controlling another by the purchase of its stock and also to the regulation of holding companies formed for the purpose of buying the stock of various different corporations. There are exceptions to the rule, which I have not read, which were properly included in the bill as it passed the Senate and are in the bill as reported by the conferees. For instance, the provision does not apply to savings banks or similar institutions which purchase stock for the purpose of investment; it does not apply to the case where a railroad company wants to build a branch line. So that there are very properly exceptions.

The particular objection I have to the section as reported by the conferees as compared with the bill as passed by the Senate is that the conferees have incorporated the word "substantially." It is a small matter; its importance is not as great, in my judgment, as the importance of some other acts of omission or commission which I have mentioned and some others which I will mention later; but it does, it seems to me, demonstrate that everywhere the bill as reported by the conferees undertakes to make it more difficult to fasten any crime or any wrong or any sin upon the trusts, and makes it more easy for the trusts and the trust magnates to escape.

What does the word "substantially" mean in this connection and why should it be incorporated in the law? Let us see. We desire to organize a holding company, let us say, a good honest one, for the purpose of investment; perhaps we are interested in a savings bank and we want to buy the stock of various corporations, some of which are competing, and hold those stocks for investment. That is not illegal; it is not intended to be made illegal by the bill which we have before us now. Why, if we are buying that stock honestly, should we want the word "substantially" in the law as a preventive? We are not trying to interfere with competition. The bill as it passed the Senate said holding companies could not be organized if their object were to lessen competition. If we are honest in our investment, the omission of the word "substantially" will not hurt us, because we will not be undertaking to lessen competition; but if we are dishonest—and the dishonest man is the man we want to get—and we are organizing the holding company for a sinister purpose, if we are doing it to create a monopoly, if we are doing it to throttle competition, then any man who complains has got to make additional proof; he must prove that it substantially lessens competition.

I want to say to you that by the time this word runs the course of the courts and winds its weary way through the various avenues of attack and defense under our judicial practice and procedure and finally reaches the Supreme Court and receives an adjudication, it will have accomplished its purpose and ruined thousands of honest business men. What is the use of putting it in? It will not help the honest corporation, but it will have a tendency to keep the dishonest corporation out from under the penalties of the law.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAPP. Was the Senator about to leave that section?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, before he leaves it, I want to remind him that buried in the provisions of section 7 is a very peculiar situation. The House provision applied to two conditions, as did the Senate provision and as does the conference report. One the condition of creating a monopoly, the other the lessening of competition. Now, as the section reads in the conference report it provides:

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community—

Of course, such acquisition would not restrain commerce, but it would create a monopoly. When we get down to the monopoly phase of section 7 we find this situation:

Or to restrain such commerce in any section or community or tend to create monopoly of any line of commerce.

In reference to the monopoly provision, the words "in any section or community" are stricken out.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. So that the section is left without any force as to both situations. The act prohibited must, in order to offend against the latter clause, be a general limitation upon commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, it is a limitation which practically nullifies whatever good there might be in the provision.

Mr. CLAPP. Absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. Does the Senator think that the Congress has anything to do with trade "in any section or community" as such, except as it is a part of interstate commerce?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has included that in the bill which he has brought in.

Mr. CLAPP. If not, then why the language of the conference report with reference to monopoly?

Mr. CHILTON. It is difficult to answer two questions at the same time. I understand the Senator's theory about it, but inasmuch as the provision is attacked because the words "in any section or community" were stricken out, I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that those words were stricken out by the Senate and not by the conferees. Therefore, so far as the Senate conferees were concerned, we had the instructions of the Senate to strike them out. Why were those words stricken out? The matter was discussed on the floor of the Senate. They were stricken out simply because a monopoly is a monopoly anywhere and everywhere. There is no such thing as monopoly in interstate commerce in a town, or monopoly in interstate commerce in a county, or monopoly in interstate commerce in a section or a community. It is a monopoly or it is not a monopoly. If it is a monopoly in interstate commerce, that is what we have power to deal with, and to put in the words "in any section or community" would simply becloud the definition and make it, possibly, inconsistent with itself and with everything else. A monopoly in interstate commerce is a monopoly in interstate commerce; you can not qualify it; you can not limit it; you can not extend it. If it is not a monopoly, it is not one; and if it is, it is; and it was the deliberate judgment of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and of the Senate itself that the words "in any section or community" were either meaningless or else a restriction that might destroy the law, and therefore should be stricken out; and your conferees carried out the judgment and the direction of the Senate in leaving them out.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the explanation of the Senator from West Virginia does away with the fact that I believe to be true, that the words "or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce" mean and must mean the entire country. They must include within their scope the entire country, and if a particular provision can not be effective until that condition exists, then, as the Senator from Minnesota has well said, you might just as well strike out the section, because it is a nullity; it means nothing. That language is a modification of the section. Under the conference bill this section has no application unless there is a monopoly in any line of trade which includes the entire country as a result of the thing complained of.

Now I want to pass over to section 11 of the bill as it passed the Senate. There was an amendment in that section that was put in upon the floor of the Senate upon my own motion. It was stricken out by the conferees, and the bill as brought back by them has no provision whatever relating to the particular thing to which I want to call attention.

Section 11, as the bill passed the Senate, read as follows:

SEC. 11. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation or against officers of a corporation by stockholders thereof may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts any business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found, and where in any such suit against officers of a corporation necessary and proper defendants reside in other districts than the one in which the action is pending the court shall make an order for the summoning of such defendants, and the same may be served in any district by the marshal thereof.

In lieu of that the conferees have brought in a section, known as section 12, which reads as follows:

SEC. 12. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found or transacts business; and all process in such cases may be served in the district of which it is an inhabitant, or wherever it may be found.

Now, you will note the particular thing that is omitted. The particular provision that was in the Senate section that has been omitted by the conferees is that part of the section which gives a stockholder of a corporation the right to sue the corporation, and after he has sued the corporation to have summons served in any other district where necessary parties reside.

These words, in the first place, are omitted:

Or against officers of a corporation by stockholders thereof.

So that the section, as it reads now, contains no authority for the stockholder of a corporation to begin an action against the corporation under the antitrust laws, which, as I shall show shortly, is a very important proposition. Then it omits this language:

And where in any such suit against officers of a corporation necessary and proper defendants reside in other districts than the one in which the action is pending the court shall make an order for the summoning—

And so forth.

I want to call the attention of the Senate now to an actual case. The bill as it passed the Senate would, for instance, enable a stockholder of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway to begin an action by injunction against the officials of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern and the New York Central & Hudson River Railways to prevent them from amalgamating those two companies and various other companies, as they have been doing within the last few months. The bill as it is brought back here by the conferees prohibits any such thing.

It was thought by some lawyers that section 57 of the United States Code gave this authority. Several months ago some stockholders of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway commenced, in the United States district court at Detroit, Mich., an action asking for an injunction restraining the carrying out of certain schemes of combination between the New York Central, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, the Michigan Central, and some other companies. The stockholders of this company went into court. They got a temporary order issued, or an order to show cause, or something of that kind. The first step was taken. They thought section 57 of the United States Code gave the court authority to issue the order.

That case came on for hearing. It was the case of Charles J. Spencer against the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, the New York Central & Hudson River Railway, and others, I think, and on the 26th day of last June the preliminary order was issued. Later it came on for hearing, and the case was dismissed by the district judge—and, I believe, properly—on the ground that he had no jurisdiction.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. Was that a suit brought to test the rights of stockholders under the laws of the State? I do not refer to jurisdiction, now. Was it a suit brought to test the rights of stockholders in the property of the corporation after the corporation had failed to do its duty as to some matter, or was it a suit brought under the antitrust laws?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to that, Senator, that I have not, of course, read the papers filed in the case—— .

Mr. CHILTON. I think it is very important that we should know that.

Mr. NORRIS. But I think I can tell the Senator what sort of a suit it was. It was a suit asking for an injunction to restrain the officials of those railroad companies from carrying out the program of consolidation that they had agreed on.

Mr. CHILTON. Then, as I understand, it was clearly a suit which the antitrust laws could not affect, but was a suit brought by stockholders, as parties in interest, under the well-known rule that where the managing officers of a corporation fail to perform a duty affecting the property of the corporation, then, after notice as required in the Federal court, and, under such rules as may be prescribed by the State court or the law, the stockholder may bring the suit himself. Am I not right?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the Senator is not quite right, as I understand the suit. It was alleged and claimed by the plaintiffs in the suit that things were about to be done by these corporations that were contrary to the antitrust laws of the United States and were illegal.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to call the Senator's attention to this feature of the matter: Does the Senator think the words "or against officers of a corporation by stockholders thereof" confer any jurisdiction? Does the Senator think those words give any jurisdiction in regard to that subject matter? The section in question deals with the venue and the service of process.

Mr. NORRIS. I do; yes.

Mr. CHILTON. I hope the Senator will look at it again. The section is speaking here of the service of process; that is, in suits to be brought. It does not say here that the stockholder may bring a suit against the officers of a corporation; but, where the jurisdiction is already given and the right already secured, this speaks of the service of process and how it may be had—quite a different subject. There is no jurisdiction conferred here, and no right conferred except as to where a suit may be brought and how process may be served.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, I suppose the Senator thinks that whether these words are in or out it is exactly the same; that if they are in, they do not mean anything?

Mr. CHILTON. If they are in, they give no further jurisdiction to a Federal court and no further right to a stockholder. The only thing they do is to provide for the service of process when it is already provided for, and it only complicates the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there is any question about it. As a matter of fact, if these words do not mean anything, I am surprised that they were not permitted to remain in; but those are not the only words that have been taken out. There is the method of getting service. I wish the Senator would let me go on with this particular case.

Mr. CHILTON. I certainly will. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to show the history of what actually occurred.

This case came on in Detroit. One of these corporations was an inhabitant of the State of Michigan. Another one was an inhabitant of the State of New York, although, as I shall call attention to later, the Lake Shore Railroad had had its articles of incorporation recorded in the State of New York under a statute of New York, so that it became a New York corporation also. The judge, in deciding that case, attached this notation to his opinion:

For the sole reason that this court had no jurisdiction to make said order of June 26, 1914, because this suit was not commenced to enforce any legal or equitable lien upon or claim to or to remove any encumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title within this district where this suit was brought within the true intent and meaning of section 57 of the Judicial Code, and the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. is and was not an inhabitant of or found within this district, and has not voluntarily appeared to this suit, no question other than whether this court had jurisdiction to make said order of June 26, 1914, was decided.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me follow the suit. I am going to take it up in another court, and show you just exactly what happened. So that there may be no question about it, I have here section 57 of the code under which these people brought that suit. In part, so far as it applies here, it reads as follows:

When in any suit commenced in any district court of the United States to enforce any legal or equitable lien upon or claim to, or to remove any encumbrance or lien or cloud upon the title to real or personal property within the district where such suit is brought, one or more of the defendants therein shall not be an inhabitant of or found within the said district, or shall not voluntarily appear thereto, it shall be lawful—

And so forth.

Then it tells how the court can get service on him. The judge in Detroit held—and, as I think, very properly—that this particular case could not stand under that section of the code, and it was the only section of the United States law that it was even pretended gave the courts any jurisdiction, and he dismissed the suit. These stockholders, having their money invested in this property and claiming that the officers of these railroad corporations were violating the laws of the United States and thus squandering their property, wanted to get into some court to restrain them from doing so. They claimed and alleged that they were doing something that was contrary to the antitrust laws of the United States in regard to combinations. They went into Detroit, commenced their action in the district court of Michigan, where the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern road resided, and tried to get service under section 57 on the New York Central road in New York, and the court held they could not do it.

Then they took the next step. They found that the Lake Shore road had gone through the formality of reincorporating in the State of New York; so they went to New York and commenced their action, where there was not any question that the court had jurisdiction of both of these railroad companies. They began their action in New York and the judge in New York threw them out of court. I read an extract from the New York Sun of September 9, 1914, showing what happened to these people when they got down into New York:

In a decision denying a motion for a temporary injunction restraining the proposed merger of the New York Central and the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway lines Judge Grubb, in the United States district court, yesterday suggested that a suit by the Government under the Sherman law would be the best way of determining the legality or illegality of the merger. This method, he intimates, would also settle a similar question in connection with the present control of the Lake Shore lines by the Central, which holds the former under a lease.

The motion for a temporary injunction was made by minority stockholders of the Lake Shore. They wanted to prevent the roads from carrying out the consolidation plans during the pendency of the equity suit by which the minority stockholders seek to prevent the merger.

The plaintiffs allege that the proposed consolidation is not only in violation of the Sherman law, but an injustice to the minority stockholders of the Lake Shore, who would receive less stock in the consolidated company than their present holdings are worth.

The railroads replied that the computations by which the plaintiffs arrived at this conclusion were erroneous. They also held that an injunction under the Sherman law could be asked for only by the Government. If the proposed consolidation is in violation of the Sherman law, they argue, then the lease under which the Central holds the Lake Shore lines must be in a similar category. On the other hand, they say, the Government has for years acquiesced in the Central's control of the Lake Shore lines through the failure of the Department of Justice to take action in the case.

Judge Grubb, however, said that such "acquiescence" would not prevent the Government from hereafter instituting proceedings to dissolve the combination if it were found to be in violation of the Sherman law. To have the legality or illegality of the Central's control determined in this way once and for all, he said, would be of great advantage.

And in conclusion, now, using the judge's exact language—language in quotation marks—this article says:

"The averments of the bill," says Judge Grubb, "are sufficient to put in issue, as a matter of pleading, the illegality of the proposed consolidation under the Sherman Act. It is clear that so important and complicated an issue can not be satisfactorily determined except upon final hearing, and would be best determined in a suit in which the Government was the complaining party, since a decision in a suit instituted by the United States would be binding on all parties."

Now, here is an instance where a man had gone from one court to another trying to restrain what he alleged to be a violation of the antitrust laws of the United States, and he was driven out of one court after another, first because one court had no jurisdiction and, when he got the corporation where the court did have jurisdiction, then because the judge said the suit ought to be commenced by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CHILTON rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I recognize the force of what the Senator says, but it is incomprehensible to me that any man can argue that the words referred to in section 11 would extend the scope of these antitrust cases. Let me read from that section just a moment and then I will ask my question:

That any suit or action or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation—

I will read it that way—

may be brought—

And so forth. That provides where the suit may be brought. It does not give any further jurisdiction or right. If, as a matter of fact, the suit could not be brought before that section was passed, it would not allow the suit to be brought afterwards. It only speaks of the service of the process and where the suit may be brought. It does not refer to the jurisdiction of the court. The other language of the section provides that process may be served in another district. That is already the law. If the bill be passed, if the court has jurisdiction of the case, suits may be brought in one district and the other defendants may be served in another district.

The conferees gave considerable consideration to this. There were two reasons why the conferees struck out the words referred to. First, it added nothing to the jurisdiction, and, even if it did, we do not want to bring the antitrust laws into contempt by allowing officers and stockholders who go into these trusts to use the antitrust laws to fight out and settle their own differences. We want these laws to be in the hands of the Government, so that they can stop violations of the antitrust laws. The jurisdiction of the court is properly fixed, and where process may be served is definitely laid down in the law. In this act we do not want it possible for these people to get in ahead of the Government and go into a community, with all kinds of litigation and decrees, and mix up the situation before the Government takes its straight, even, comprehensive course to break up the combination.

This, if it would do anything, would retard and injure the Government in its effort to break up these monopolies. We do not want Tom, Dick, and Harry, who may be stockholders, to bring suits against the directors here and there and probably interfere with the ordinary course of the Government's suits. This section now does not do that. It confers no additional jurisdiction. It simply provides how you can serve process, having jurisdiction already. There is not a line here giving jurisdiction in that kind of a case.

The Senator put in his amendment at the wrong place. If he wanted to give a stockholder the right to sue the officers of a corporation, he should have given it in the jurisdictional section. If the court has not jurisdiction, there is no suit to be brought; and if there is no suit to be brought, what need we care as to where you may serve process? The proposition has no place in the section under consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in the first place I do not believe there is any doubt about the jurisdiction. There are two provisions here, both of which have been stricken out. One is as follows:

Or against officers of a corporation by stockholders thereof.

Another is:

Where in any such suit against officers of a corporation.

Mr. President, I do not believe there can be a possibility of doubt that with that language the court would have jurisdiction, and having jurisdiction, then it could make the order to bring about the service. Let me assume, however, for argument's sake, that it would not, and that the Senator from West Virginia is right. What is the position? Here come the conferees and say "This ought to be put in in a different place; the language is not quite right; it ought to have been different." Then, for God's sake, why did they not make it right and bring it in here and correct it? Why did they strike it out? If there is something wrong about it, if in my ignorance, shared in by the Senate of the United States, we have not reached that high pinnacle of wisdom that enshrouds and shines around the conferees on this bill, why did they not give us light instead of striking it out? Why not be fair about it? If this is not the right place, put it in the right place.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think I can answer the Senator's question. I have examined the work of the conferees very carefully. I think they acted according to a policy. They are consistent.

It was never to strengthen anything, and they would have had to violate that rule if they had strengthened this particular section.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that makes a pretty——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. I am glad to see a smile on Senators' faces when that statement is made. Conferees are sometimes in a very unfortunate position. I do not think that any Senator here would in seriousness make the charge which might be implied by the answer of the Senator from Missouri. Of course, if he were serious, I would have to say to him that his statement was voluntary, and I would have at once to enter my protest against any such criticism of the work of the conferees. There is nothing in the work of the conferees, I must insist, that does not show that everything they have done here is founded upon a reason which they are not afraid to state in the United States Senate, and which they are not afraid to discuss before the people of the country.

The assumption is that those who are here trying to get some bill passed in the Senate in order that the things as to which there was no controversy, and as to which the great laboring world and the great business world is now standing on tiptoe to see what this Senate shall do, shall be settled, may not be in favor of substantial reform. I am willing to leave it to the country whether the friends of the reform shall be upon the side of those who want the best bill possible, or on the side of those who want to beat this legislation unless they happen to get what they may want. That is for the country to decide. I make that statement in the best of humor and in the best of feeling to all parties concerned.

I simply want to state for the conferees that they came to the conclusion as lawyers that these words could possibly have no meaning in this law, and they struck them out. They agreed to strike them out. The House did not want them there and the Senate conferees could not give any good reason for having them there; and I will say further that when the amendment was offered by the Senator from Nebraska I naturally supposed, as many of us here supposed, that there was jurisdiction already conferred in some place by the general law and that the words inserted, on the motion of the Senator, were in aid of that jurisdiction already conferred.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator supposed there was jurisdiction?

Mr. CHILTON. I did not then know anything definite about it.

Mr. NORRIS. He supposed there was jurisdiction, and he therefore favored the amendment. If later on he found there was no jurisdiction, why, in the name of heaven, did he not give jurisdiction? He and the other conferees had the power.

Mr. CHILTON. I told the Senator that we did not believe it was the best policy to give jurisdiction to the stockholders to mix up in a suit by the Government to dissolve these corporations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The claim has been repeatedly made, by direction or indirection, upon the floor of the Senate that those who are insisting that this conference report should not be accepted, but that the bill should be sent back to the conferees with instructions to restore to it certain provisions are in favor of beating all this legislation. That statement is not warranted by any fact or by any utterance upon the floor of the Senate or elsewhere. It is a strange proposition that the Senate of the United States having named four agents to carry out its will does not have the right when those agents report to either accept or reject their report and then to send them, if it sees fit, back for further labor in conference to the end that the will of the Senate may be properly engrafted into this statute.

The statement has been repeatedly made here until I am inclined almost to resent it that we must take this or have no legislation. That is not the situation. Surely the conferees do not mean to say to the Senate that if the Senate sees fit to disagree to their labor they will decline to obey the directions of the Senate and endeavor to perfect this legislation in accordance with the will of the Senate. They can not afford to take that position, and surely they do not take it.

Therefore, when the statement is repeatedly made here that it is this bill or nothing, the statement is not a sound statement. That is not the situation. The situation to-day is whether the Senate is willing to accept this bill as it is; and, if not, whether it will give the conferees further instructions. That has been often done, and it can be properly done. When any man stands upon the floor of the Senate or in the cloakroom or otherwise and charges that those who want this report amended are in favor of defeating the entire bill, he is making a gratuitous statement which, in so far as I know, is not founded upon any fact.

There are some good features in this bill that we all desire to preserve. I know no one worked in committee more assiduously than I did to preserve the anti-injunction features of the bill. No one contended more vigorously than I did, no one has been a better friend of that class of legislation than I have been, not only in this session of Congress but for many years. But it does not follow because that legislation is in the bill that in order to secure it we must permit the trust legislation of this country to be emasculated or the Democratic platform, indeed I might say the platform of the country, to be repudiated by the adoption here of trust legislation that will, in my opinion, practically result in the emasculation of trust prosecution.

This is not a "pork-barrel" bill. It is not to be passed upon the theory that because some parts of it suit you you must vote for a lot of things that do not commend themselves to your judgment.

I am taking this much of the time of the Senator from Nebraska because I know the report has been assiduously circulated upon the floor of the Senate that it is this bill just as it is brought to us or nothing. I repudiate that idea. I say that the Senate of the United States is supreme in this matter; that it can send its conferees back, and it can send them back again and again, and at the end of all the conferences it can then determine whether or not it will accept the bill as reported.

It is not my judgment that the conferees are so wedded to their opinion or so proud of their work that they will not listen to the opinion of the Houses which created them. I do not believe the House conferees are going to take the position stubbornly that they have finished the work, that the book is written, that it has been sealed, and that Congress must accept it or else have no bill at all. I have never seen anything in the past character or history of those gentlemen from the House of Representatives or our own conferees to warrant the conclusion that they would assume any such position.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to make just this statement. I hope nothing which I said may be construed as meaning that this would be the only bill which could be passed now. I simply volunteered my own opinion for what it is worth. The Senator is entitled to his opinion and I am entitled to mine. Meanwhile, Mr. President, I am very much gratified that the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Minnesota are so zealous in maintaining the Democratic platform in their efforts to prevent the bill, as reported, from becoming the law of the land.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I said in substance, at the beginning of my remarks about this conference report, what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has so much better said—that the rejection of the report does not mean necessarily no legislation—but I will add again that, if it does, as far as I am concerned and as far as I am able to go, I am willing to take the responsibility of defeating it entirely rather than to put it on the statute books in this form, because if we defeat it now and there is not any legislation at this session, it will be an issue before the country, and we will fight it out before the country and eventually get the sentiment of the country enacted into law.

Now, I want to say just a word about the remark the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] made about my solicitude for the Democratic Party. I am a believer in individual responsibility. I am not much of a party man. I listened to the arguments of various Democrats and agreed with them that we ought to make the guilt personal; but it did seem to me that with the Democratic platform written as it has been and promulgated as it has been, and having obtained a triumph in the election upon that platform, even I, without criticism, might have the right, the privilege, of humbly calling the attention of Democratic friends to the promises which they made the country and what I believe to be a violation of those promises when they are placed in power to make them good; and I will take that liberty now and elsewhere whenever I see fit. I have no particular solicitude for the Democratic Party nor any other political party. My allegiance to a party is not so great that I will ever vary one hair's breadth in any official action that I have to take because of the demands of party leaders or party caucuses or party machines or party bosses.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I might say that the attitude assumed by the Senator from Nebraska in calling attention to the Democratic platform has a warrant in very ancient precedent. Long ago it was written, "Out of your own mouths do I condemn you."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that ought to be taken home by every Democrat. I mention it in the best of faith. I have called attention to the Republicans, when they were in power, to their platforms, and I have condemned their conduct when I believed it to be wrong. I had the greatest admiration for the Senator from Missouri, when his own party was in power, in getting up before the Senate and before the country and calling attention to the party pledges and the way they were being disregarded here, and the country will uphold him in it, regardless of politics, and I commend him for it, regardless of politics. I will do it anywhere, at any time, in any campaign. It seems to me we ought to go that far to be fair. If platforms are worth anything, they ought to be kept. As I said, the Democratic platform has been all tattered and torn to pieces, with one plank left, and there is ample opportunity to violate that before the time has expired.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was discussing an actual case, where a citizen of the United States had brought suit—a whole lot of them, in fact. They were not all in the suit, but there was one of them who began the suit and carried it on in his own name. Others helped him and bore their share of the expense. They went into court in good faith up in Michigan, and the judge threw them out of court because the New York Central was not within its jurisdiction. Then they went to New York, and there the judge threw them out of court because he said—and I think wrongfully, but without any criticism of him; he had the right to do it—the Government of the United States ought to begin the suit. There was an Attorney General, Mr. McReynolds, here in Washington at that time who would not begin the suit. So what are you going to do about it? His attention had been called to it. He had been written to in regard to it. He declined to intervene. The Government of the United States, as represented by the Attorney General, at that time would not turn a wheel. What is the citizen going to do? Grinding between these two big corporations there is a minority stockholder seeking first in one court and then in the other to get relief, driven out of that court because of want of jurisdiction and out of this court because the judge said the Government ought to file a suit, and the Government would not. There is no question about it, but the Government would not. What are you going to do when you have an Attorney General who believes in these combinations, who will not turn a wheel to break any of them up?

I say that in this case without fear of successful contradiction, because I introduced a resolution in the Senate here calling the attention of the Senate to it. I read here in the Senate letters that were written to the Department of Justice calling their attention to this very combination, written by stockholders, asking the Department of Justice to take action. There was nothing done. What are you going to do, then?

Here was a provision in the bill that would bring relief, and the conferees strike it out and say we ought not to do that; that if we let a lot of these little fellows get into court here, they might interfere with some action that the Government would want to begin. Nobody will begin those suits if the Government will commence them; but when you have an administration that will not begin them, that does not want to break up those combinations apparently, then what? Then let the innocent suffer. Then let the minority stockholder pocket his losses and let the railroads combine and combine without interference from any source. That is the result of the striking out of this language in the bill as it passed the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, the bill as it passed the Senate contained what was then section 25, a very useful and important section, in my judgment; one that has more teeth in it than any other one section of the bill. I believe it is more valuable than any other section in the bill. That section read as follows:

SEC. 25. That whenever a corporation shall acquire or consolidate the ownership or control of the plants, franchises, or property of other corporations, copartnerships, or individuals, so that it shall be adjudged to be a monopoly or combination in restraint of trade, the court rendering such judgment shall decree its dissolution and shall to that end appoint receivers to wind up its affairs and shall cause all of its assets to be sold in such manner and to such persons as will, in the opinion of the court, restore competition as fully and completely as it was before said corporation or combination began to be formed. The court shall reserve in its decree jurisdiction over said assets so sold for a sufficient time to satisfy the court that full and free competition is restored and assured.

That was contained in the law as it passed the Senate. It is out of the bill as it comes back in the shape of the conference report. It is entirely out. There is no modification of it. There is nothing done; it is entirely stricken out.

Mr. President, I have always contended that in order to successfully solve the trust proposition we must enact laws that would make one of two things certain. If not both, at least one of these two things must be certain. One of them is that you must provide, by proper criminal law, jail sentences for those who organize and control trusts in violation of law. That is one way. Another way is to make it financially unprofitable for anybody or any set of men to organize a trust. I contend that either one of those methods will break up the trusts. If you will send a few trust magnates to jail, that will break it up. If you will pass a law that will make it financially unprofitable to organize trusts, that will break it up; and it will be a sure remedy, because no trust was ever organized except for the purpose of profit.

This bill, if you will take the provisions of the House bill and the provisions of the bill as it passed the Senate, contained both such provisions. It was within the power of the conferees to bring in a bill here that contained criminal provisions and contained other provisions that would make it unprofitable for trusts to organize or for trusts to exist, but they have done neither one. So it was within the power of the conferees to bring a bill here that would give absolute relief and without doing any honest man any injury. What have they done? They have stricken out all the criminal provisions. They have stricken out the provision that would have made it unprofitable for a trust to organize and to be dissolved by the Government. It has been shown here, it is common knowledge that the Tobacco Trust was worth more after the Government got through dissolving it than it was before. It is common knowledge that the Telephone Trust that was dissolved recently under the present administration was worth more after it was dissolved than it was before. We ought to pass a law that would provide that a trust shall pay the Government as a tax a certain percentage of the profit it makes by the dissolution of such a trust by the Government. If we are going to dissolve trusts and make money for them, we ought to give the Government a part of the profits. I believe the trusts would be willing to give a portion of it and would not kick.

Here is a provision that, if it had been enacted into law, whenever a trust was dissolved by a court, would have taken some of the property of that trust; in other words, it would not have been profitable for a trust to organize and have the Government dissolve it. That would have made the business financially unprofitable and would have been an efficient remedy.

The Senator from West Virginia, in quite a long and labored argument yesterday, explained why the conferees took out this provision. The Senator's argument was that, if this provision had been left in, it would have been a harsh remedy; it would have caused too much annoyance to the trust, too much trouble to them to be dissolved, and would have been too expensive for them. Well, if you want to stop the trust business, that is just what you want to do. Is not that true as to every other violator of the law? Could we not say the same of the common thief? Suppose we had before one of our committees an organization of train robbers, and they said, "Now, we want you to change the law against train robbery, because every time we rob a train and the Government gets after us it is too expensive for us; there is too much trouble about it; it costs us too much of our loot to get away; we want the law modified; we would like to have you strike out the penalty, and turn us over to some Young Men's Christian Association or to some Bible class somewhere and have them deal with us." That would be just as reasonable. Here come the trusts, and they say, "Why, here is a provision in this law that costs us something when we violate the law; it makes it expensive if we become violators of the law; if the Government brings suit against us and we are dissolved, we will have to pay some money; we can not stand that; we have been used to being dissolved and making a profit out of it; we do not want such a law as this." The conferees come along and say, "Why, sure, gentlemen, you millionaire trust organizers, when we dissolve you we always give you a bonus on a silver platter and raise the price of your stock on the stock exchanges, so we will not put in this law something that authorizes and directs the court to appoint a receiver to take charge of the assets of your institution."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Nebraska says this provision "authorizes" the courts to appoint receivers. Does he not recall that it expressly directs and commands them to do so in all such cases?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Did I say "authorizes"? I am willing to correct that; it directs.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does not the Senator understand that the existing law authorizes the courts to dissolve combinations in restraint of trade?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably; yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. And to appoint receivers?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, does the Senator believe that that ought to be done in all cases—that the courts ought to be required in every case to do that?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know of any case that ought to be an exception, but I am glad the Senator from Texas has called my attention to it, because I realize that in legislative matters a great many minds are better than a few, and our conferees meeting the conferees of the other House, offering arguments back and forth and exchanging ideas, may get ideas that have not occurred to us here. Let us say that this is too severe; suppose there is something in this provision that is wrong; suppose it ought to be modified, then why not modify it? The conferees had the power to do so. Why exclude it altogether? If there is anything too severe in it, then modify it.

The Senator from West Virginia made an argument against this provision as being too harsh, too terrible a remedy to enforce in all cases. Then why not bring the provision in in a modified form? If there is something about it that is wrong, if there is something about it that will hurt an honest man, then let us modify and change it; but let us not strike it out entirely.

I think we ought to provide by law that where a court finds that there has been a trust in existence, it ought to go further and find how much profit the trust has made out of its illegal business, and the trust ought to be assessed a penalty of about twice that profit to be paid to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Nebraska will recall, doubtless, that in the Tobacco case, reported in Two hundred and twenty-first United States, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by the Chief Justice, declared that in the United States courts there are two general remedies; first, the dissolution of combinations by injunction and prevention of entering interstate trade by those combinations and monopolies; and, second, by the appointment of receivers and sales of property. When that general authority exists and those remedies are recognized by the highest tribunal in our land, would not the Senator from Nebraska be willing to leave the matter to the discretion and judgment of the court, as the conferees did, as to whether or not receivers should be appointed?

Mr. NORRIS. No. If I had my way about it, I would enact the provision that is here or some similar provision. I have not had anything called to my attention that makes me believe there is anything wrong with it; but I would certainly be glad, if I had it in my power, to either put it on the statute books or not; I would be glad to listen to some one who claims that there was something wrong about it; and if convinced that there was, I would certainly modify it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Would the Senator from Nebraska be willing for me to have read from the desk an excerpt from the opinion of Chief Justice White in the Tobacco case, giving reasons why in all cases receivers should not be appointed?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I prefer that the Senator should not take my time to do that. We are all familiar with that decision.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator was saying that he had never heard any reason given why receivers should not be appointed in all cases, and I was suggesting that Chief Justice White, of the Supreme Court of the United States, undertook to give such reasons.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have read what the Chief Justice said, and I was about to suggest, when the Senator interrupted me, suppose we prosecute a trust, and it has been found guilty, and the court dissolves it, and a receiver is appointed; suppose that in that case it has not done much wrong; suppose, for the purpose of illustration, that it has not been successful, or something of that kind, that it has not any property to amount to anything. There is not anything in particular to do if it has not got control of a long line of trade in a large section of country, if it is confined to a small industry, to some locality or something of that kind, perhaps justice would not demand that anything be done with its property. It might have been a failure financially. In that case a receiver could not hurt it any; if a receiver were appointed there would not be anything to do but to have him discharged; there would not be any injury.

Mr. CULBERSON. But the section which the Senator is discussing expressly declares that there shall be a receiver appointed, and that the property shall be sold in all such cases.

Mr. NORRIS. It might be well to modify that probably, and to provide that the property should not be sold in all cases, but that a receiver should be appointed. Perhaps there ought to be a rule laid down regarding it. I have always thought that we ought to provide by rule of law that the courts should determine, should make a judicial finding as to how much profit the trust had illegally made by reason of its combinations, and then should hold sufficient of that property, take it away from the trusts, perhaps twice the amount, so as to make it unprofitable, so that it would not again go into the business, or even take away from them the property they had unlawfully acquired; at least, they should not be permitted to profit by their illegal methods, and they should not be permitted to keep their ill-gotten gains when they are found guilty.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, the provision reads:

> The court rendering such judgment shall decree its dissolution and shall to that end appoint receivers to wind up its affairs and shall cause all of its assets to be sold.

So this section, if adopted literally, would not only require a dissolution in all cases where monopoly and restraint of trade were proven, but it would require the appointment of receivers and the sale of all the assets, the property of the combination, in every case whatsoever, regardless of the circumstances under which the court found the property surrounded.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I presume, if we were going to adopt this section literally, what the Senator from Texas says would be true; but I have repeatedly pointed out that we need not take it literally; the conferees could have modified it. Trusts not financially profitable are not prosecuted—they dissolve themselves; they do not get into court.

Mr. CULBERSON. Suppose the conferees on the part of the Senate endeavored to secure a modification, would they not have discharged their full duty to the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to get the idea that I am urging that the conferees on the part of the Senate have not discharged their full duty. I do not know what went on in the conference room, and I do not pretend to know; but I am pointing out here what I believe to be the objectionable features of this legislation and giving my idea as to what ought to be done by the Senate. Regardless of what happened anywhere or everywhere, regardless of what went on in the conference room, regardless of how faithfully the conferees on the part of the Senate may have endeavored to retain this provision and other Senate provisions in the bill, we have the concrete fact here before us, as I believe, a bill that is almost worse than nothing; that leaves out all the teeth of the antitrust legislation; that gives us a milk-and-water proposition. So far as I am concerned, I should be willing to take the responsibility, if I only could do so, of defeating the bill entirely rather than to have it go on the statute books in that form; for, if we pass this bill, it will be years before we shall have any further trust legislation; the matter will be considered as settled by the party in power; it will be ended, and we will not go any further with it. So, regardless of everything that may have happened—so far as my vote and my influence are concerned, I care not what happened—I know what is before us. I believe it is unworthy of the Senate, it is unworthy of the Democratic Party with the pledges it has made. We ought to send this bill back to conference; and if we can not get anything better out of a conference, we ought to kill the bill if we can, and let the country take it up as it will.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Referring to section 25, which has been stricken out, I desire to remind the Senator from Nebraska that crimes are committed under two conditions, sometimes under the stress of mental duress, brought about either by intense passion or by a strong stress of circumstances in the form of necessity; and some consideration should be shown to those who commit crimes under those circumstances; but no body of men ever organized a trust and carried that trust forward year after year without being conscious of it, doing it deliberately, and under no natural moral stress. They could avoid all the errors that have been depicted as flowing from the enactment of the Senate amendment by simply withholding and restraining from being a trust. The conferees are too merciful.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no doubt about that.

I desire now to refer to another section, which has been stricken out. Section 26 as it passed the Senate provided:

SEC. 26. It shall be unlawful for any corporation engaged in commerce to do any business in any State contrary to the laws of the State under which said corporation was created or contrary to the laws of the State in which it may be doing business. The District of Columbia shall be deemed a State within the meaning of this section.

In the bill as it comes back to us from conference that provision is entirely stricken out and nothing is offered in its place. I am not going to comment further on that.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it can be truthfully said that we will never be able to settle the trust question until we either make it unprofitable for a trust to organize or surround trust magnates with such criminal laws as will make it dangerous for them to organize. That danger, if we resort to that method, must be so certain as to amount almost to a conviction, and when we put into the law little words that will enable them in a court to offer unusual evidence, to secure delays, to resort to technicalities—when we incorporate in the law such words as the word "substantially," which has been so often used throughout this bill in different places by the conferees, we only give the trusts and trust promoters additional avenues of escape.

The kind of legislation that I have outlined would not be harmful to business; it would not injure honest men; it would do no injury to those who were obeying the law. If we want to handle the trusts and trust magnates lightly and gingerly, as this conference bill will handle them, we might just as well give them license to prey upon the people and the country without limit.

I am not moved by the plea that some of the remedies proposed would be harsh. We must make them harsh; we must make penalties that are severe if we would deter men from wrongdoing, and we do so in all other cases. The common individual, the ordinary citizen, the man with whom we do business, whom we meet on the street and in our homes and in our clubs, the ordinary person, has to run these risks. He is liable to criminal laws and to laws controlling his business, and he is sent to jail if he violates them. It is safe to say that it is very seldom, if ever, that the innocent go to jail or are punished. That may happen sometimes, but when you come to deal with a millionaire who has organized a trust, you immediately are stricken with mercy, and say, "We should not be harsh with this man; we ought not to provide any remedy, such as the dissolution of his illegal combination, which would injure him or cause him any worry or cause him any expense or financial loss; we ought to deal gently with him."

Mr. President, it seems to me that, until we are willing to bring everyone before the law without regard to his power, his position, or his wealth, and let everyone stand equally the punishment and the penalty for violation of the law, we can not claim that we are doing our duty to ourselves, to our country, or to humanity.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in considering this conference report, I find it necessary to deal somewhat with the genesis of the movement and the sentiment out of which this legislation has grown; and in doing that I shall have recourse to certain declarations made by the present Chief Executive of the United States. I shall not deal with this question from a partisan standpoint, because I shall demonstrate unquestionably that the evil back of the present situation is bipartisan rather than partisan.

I hold in my hand a collection of speeches made by the present Chief Executive. Unfortunately, the date of each speech is not given, but the one from which I desire to quote first, I judge from the text, must have been delivered between the time of his election and the time when he took the oath of office. I want to say that, if it were in my power, I would have every young man in America read this work entitled "New Freedom." While I think the President has never sounded the depths of real democracy as a Jefferson or as a Lincoln would have sounded those depths, there is in this work a world of splendid enunciation of fundamental principles. I quote from page 201:

We are at the parting of the ways. We have, not one or two or three, but many, established and formidable monopolies in the United States. We have, not one or two, but many, fields of endeavor into which it is difficult, if not impossible, for the independent man to enter.

At this point I am going to deal for a moment with the question of whether or not any legislation in free government designed to regulate any forces within that government is necessary or desirable. According to my concept there can be but two possible excuses for government. One is that there may be certain benefits that can be derived from the combined force of the people in the association called government which the individual unaided can not secure, such as highways, schools, sanitation, fire protection, and so forth. Aside from those benefits there is only one possible excuse for the burden of government, and that is that there always has been, and is now, a minority, numerically small, seeking—and I prove this out of the mouth of the President himself—to impose unjust burdens upon the many. There are those who fear the tyranny of the many, but the fact is that the eternal struggle of the ages has been on the part of the many to protect themselves from the aggressions of the few. This being true, then it follows that in free government it is necessary and desirable that there should be a constant endeavor made to repress the efforts of that few.

In dealing with this question, as I proceed I shall have occasion to refer to that class of people against whom society finds itself obliged to organize for protection. I want to say at the outset that for one I believe that the great majority of men are honest; I believe that the great majority of those engaged in business are honest; but that there are in our midst to-day those engaged in business who have transferred to the peaceful field of industrial and commercial life that spirit of dominion which that same force lost upon the field of battle goes without question.

Were any additional proof of the desirability of proper regulative legislation necessary I would simply refer to the fact that the friends of this conference report and everyone else in both Houses of Congress insist that the Sherman antitrust law, that great regulative measure which Congress passed years ago, must not be impaired or interfered with. Out of the mouths, then, of the advocates of the conference report I establish the necessity and the advisability of legislation in restraint of inordinate greed and the spirit of commercial and industrial oppression.

This movement began some years ago, and, as I have once before stated upon this floor, the Sherman antitrust law was passed at a time that was most inopportune for the history of that measure itself. Following its passage came the great panic of 1893 to 1897, following that the Spanish-American War, and coincident with that the revival of business. During that long period there was little thought or effort to restrain the growth of monopoly in this country. People then were turning toward and pleading and longing for a revival of industrial activity, but there came a time when the American people began to realize the importance of enforcing the Sherman antitrust law and of defending the principles upon which that law was based.

From 1901 to 1909 there was a marked period of activity along this line. During that period we passed the great anti-rebate law of 1903; we passed the great railroad law of 1906; we passed that law of publicity of which my distinguished colleague [Mr. NELSON] was the author; we passed laws providing for pure food; we passed a great series of laws calculated to relieve the American people and to put some limitation upon the inordinate greed of those who were exploiting the public and gathering to themselves the fruits of that exploitation.

Is it true, as the President says, that we have come to the "parting of the ways"—that not only shall the movement be abandoned, but that the people have abated their interest in their struggle for industrial freedom?

A few days ago my distinguished colleague, who was one of the conferees on this bill and refused to sign the conference report, in answer to some suggestion, I think, of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], made the statement that the effect of this conference report was to grant immunity to the trusts. If that statement had been made five or six years ago, falling from his lips, with the prestige of his long service, with his knowledge of what law stands for, of his just vision of the rights of mankind, it would have been flashed from one ocean to the other, and the American people would have been shocked at the suggestion that after all the antitrust agitation we were granting immunity. As it was it fell largely upon dull and deaf ears.

The distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] attributes this to a sort of complacency that has been brought about in the public mind through a propaganda in behalf of "big business." I attribute it more to the fact that preceding the election of Woodrow Wilson there rang from ocean to ocean the utterances of that man as an assurance that if he came to a position of power and influence there would be wise, just legislation in the interest of the people; and the people, listening to those speeches and reading those great essays upon the fundamentals of free government, rest complacently in the thought that they are in fact being carried out. Coupled with this condition of complacency, undoubtedly, there is a condition growing out of the somewhat disturbed business condition of the country.

So I agree with the President: "We are at the parting of the ways"; and the question now is, assuming the necessity, the advisability of legislation to restrain inordinate greed, Shall we go forward with that legislation, or shall we take a backward step?

I want to say, having been a participant in this legislation, having been a watchful attendant upon these proceedings, without any hesitation and without impugning the motives of any man, that the adoption of the conference report in its present form upon the antitrust bill known as the Clayton bill is an absolute going backward upon this great question.

We began this administration with a plea that there was to be a legislative policy; that we would have tariff enactment, followed by trust legislation; that the trust legislation should consist of three great acts of Congress—one, the Trade Commission bill; another, the bill known now as the Clayton antitrust bill; and the third, the bill to regulate the issue of securities.

During the campaign of 1912 the second leading candidate for the Presidency had taken a strong position in favor of a sort of coordinate control of big business; and perhaps just slightly influenced by that action, although in harmony with his general declarations upon this subject, the present President during that campaign severely criticised that theory of government. I quote again on page 60:

> I don't want a smug lot of experts to sit down behind closed doors in Washington and play Providence to me.

Again, he said:

> If the Government is to tell big-business men how to run their business, then don't you see that big-business men have to get closer to the Government even than they are now?

And now I quote from pages 202 and 203:

> At the least, under the plan I am opposing, there will be an avowed partnership between the Government and the trusts. * * *
> There is no hope to be seen for the people of the United States until the partnership is dissolved. And the business of the party now intrusted with power is going to be to dissolve it.

He carried out that theory and harmonized with it in his later declarations when he declared that legislation should point out these matters which by common experience have come to be recognized as evils.

Quoting now from an address which he delivered to Congress on the 20th of January, 1914:

> Surely we are sufficiently familiar with the actual processes and methods of monopoly and of the many hurtful restraints of trade to make definition possible, at any rate up to the limits of what experience has disclosed.

The experience of the country under the Sherman antitrust law had disclosed three great and acute conditions. In the first place, there had been developed and disclosed this condition of local underselling. That is, a trust or combination would enter some particular locality, put down the price of its article until it had crushed out the local independent concern, and then restore the price, and the monopoly in that particular place would be complete. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] this morning insisted that we have no right to deal with monopoly locally. But the fact is our right to deal with monopoly does not depend upon the locality where it is attempted to establish the monopoly, but upon the instrumentality that is used, and if that instrumentality is interstate commerce, then our jurisdiction over the subject is complete and whole.

Another evil that had grown up and had been discovered was the so-called tying-in contract.

Another evil that had grown up was perhaps the occasional attitude of a trust in refusing to sell a commodity to any particular individual.

Experience had brought out these three matters in bold relief. The court had held that the tying-in contract, if applied to patented articles, could not be reached under the Sherman antitrust law. The court had enumerated the local underselling as something to be reprehended and as a link in the chain of evidence that might lead to the conclusion that a trust existed.

If, when this trust legislation began, acting upon the advice of the President, which I have just read—

> These practices, being now abundantly disclosed, can be explicitly and item by item forbidden by statute in such terms as will practically eliminate uncertainty, the law itself and the penalty being equally made plain—

Congress had taken these three distinct matters, which experience had disclosed as evils not fully cured by the Sherman antitrust law, declared each and every one of them to be a misdemeanor and applied a penalty, it would have met the situation for trust legislation. It would have left the Sherman antitrust law not only unimpaired by legislation, but unimpaired practically; but now it will be found to be impaired practically by the passage of this bill if it passes in its present form.

In the meantime, however, a change had come. We had come to the "parting of the ways." Recurring now to the year 1912, it was my privilege to sit as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce during the long hearings which were held upon the trust question. One after another, as the great trust magnates came before that committee, with this theory or that, in the last analysis nearly every one reached the point where he wanted a body of men in Washington that he could come to, sit down with, and discuss the situation. It was, then, with much astonishment that I beheld the Executive apparently viewing with favor the proposition to establish a trade commission. He had suggested a trade commission, but had carefully safeguarded in his suggestion giving that trade commission any authority to declare what was or what was not illegal, for he had declared, not in the inexperience of a precampaign speech, but after a year of experience, in his address of January 20, 1914, dealing with trusts and monopolies and referring to a trade commission:

> The opinion of the country would instantly approve of such a commission. It would not wish to see it empowered to make terms with monopoly or in any sort to assume control of business, as if the Government made itself responsible.

The Trade Commission bill, however, came in, and I for one voted for it. I voted for it with some misgiving; but I realized that we can not always have such legislation as we want, and if the Trade Commission bill were fairly and loyally administered, it might prove a benefit to the country. I recognized, however, at the same time—and voted for it with hesitation for that reason—that it enlarges and emphasizes government by men.

Now, of course we all realize that, considered as an abstraction governing and guiding the policies and activities of mankind, there never was and never will be such a thing as government by law. All government, in the last analysis, rests more or less extensively in the somewhat twilight zone of human discretion; but it is desirable to limit as far as possible that twilight zone of discretion. It is in that zone that government breaks down; and the more plain and explicit we can make the mandate of the law the more we narrow that zone of discretion.

I voted for that measure because, as I say, I felt that if it were wisely administered, it might be of service to the country. I am now satisfied that it was part and parcel of a policy of which I believe the President himself was ignorant, of which I believe even the conferees on this bill are ignorant; I mean, of course, the Democratic conferees, who signed the report, for the Republican conferees refused to sign it; a policy to put this Government back into the hands of "big business."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator expresses the opinion that the President and the conferees are ignorant of the program which he says he believes to exist. I should like to ask him, notwithstanding their ignorance of it, if he is correct in his belief that such a program is being carried out, whether the President and the conferees are not being made the agents in the carrying out of that program?

Mr. CLAPP. I base my conclusion that they do not understand the full scope of the report upon two facts. First, running all through the President's precampaign speeches and running through his addresses to Congress in February is a spirit that voices service to the public that I can not reconcile with a knowledge on his part of the absolute surrender that is involved, not by the conferees, but in this conference report.

I base my conclusion upon the apologies that are offered for this report which, I say in all seriousness, betrays, to my mind, an utter lack of comprehension of the scope of the conferees' work in this case. So I must say that I believe that neither the President nor the conferees have consciously surrendered to "big business."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator conclude, then, that the President and the conferees are unable to comprehend what the real purpose of this bill is?

Mr. CLAPP. I conclude that the President is somewhat in the situation that the late great Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, described ex-President Taft as being in—"surrounded by some very amiable gentlemen who know just what they want."

Mr. BRISTOW. And how to get it?

Mr. CLAPP. And how to get it. I say that in a spirit of regret. When a group of us here broke with the Republican Party in 1909 I realized then that unless the American public could be convinced that the men then in control of the party were not the party, there would be a Democratic President. I realized then as well as I realize now that if that Democratic administration failed, and especially if it failed coincidently with an industrial depression, you could no longer talk altruism to empty stomachs; the people of this country would say, "We want to see the wheels go round," and the tendency would be to put back again into power the very men who, according to my humble judgment, betrayed their party and their country. Therefore, while I hold no brief for the Democratic Party, I wanted to see that party, at least, make good to a point where the spirit of altruism that had been aroused in those years would be able to concentrate and consolidate itself into some political force that might stand as a guiding force in the policies of this Republic.

But we have seen this work go on; we saw the Trade Commission bill pass and then this bill came here, and again I voted for this bill upon the express statement that I hoped and believed the House conferees would insist upon the House provisions which the Senate had stricken out. Let me say again that this criticism is not partisan. As I recall the history of this bill upon the floor of this body, the band of Democratic Senators, headed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], would have prevented the elimination of some of the valuable features put into this bill by the House had it not been for the votes cast by so-called Republicans. I think the RECORD will disclose this as to several votes, just as in 1909 there was that invisible government standing behind both parties. Seven times in the history of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill we would have defeated Mr. Aldrich upon a roll call; and once defeated on a roll call, we could have given this country a decent tariff bill; but in every one of those seven emergencies, when they arose, he was able to go on the Democratic side of this body and get the necessary number of votes to sustain him upon the roll call.

I wish the American people could see what is hidden in the misty mazes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; how easy it is for a Senator to stand against the amendment of a bill and then in the end vote against it, when, had he voted for the amendment, it would of itself have defeated the bill. In the consideration of that rank free-trade measure put through the Senate by Mr. Taft, known as the Canadian reciprocity bill, we might possibly have defeated that bill if some of the Senators who finally voted against the bill had voted with us in amending the bill. But a man can stand on this floor and, by the control of amendments, insure the defeat or success of legislation, and then, at the conclusion of that legislative policy, vote for or against the measure. It is this invisible, bipartisan government that is the curse of this country; and its only kindred curse, the only one that rises in dignity to it, is this fetich of party. So I trust no one will accuse me of any partisan bias in discussing this conference report.

I shall only deal with two or three features of the report. In the first place, let me take up section 2. I want to preface it by a quotation from the President which applies to all the efforts that have been made in this bill to deal with the trusts from the standpoint of benevolent, beneficent suggestions on the part of the Government. I quote again from page 203:

> And I don't believe that benevolence can be read into the hearts of the trusts by the superintendence and suggestions of the Federal Government; because the Government has never within my recollection had its suggestions accepted by the trusts. On the contrary, the suggestions of the trusts have been accepted by the Government.
> There is no hope to be seen for the people of the United States until the partnership is dissolved. And the business of the party now intrusted with power is going to be to dissolve it.

Referring now to the terms of the report of these three more acute, vicious practices that have grown up, I refer, first, to underselling; and I can not believe that the President is in sympathy with the conference report, because I read again from his book on page 177:

> You know, of course, how the little man is crushed by the trusts. He gets a local market. The big concerns come in and undersell him in his local market, and that is the only market he has; if he can not make a profit there, he is killed. They can make a profit all through the rest of the Union while they are underselling him in his locality and recouping themselves by what they can earn elsewhere. Thus their competitors can be put out of business one by one wherever they dare to show a head.

Now, some years ago——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator says he does not believe that the President can be in sympathy with the bill as framed in the conference. Does not the Senator know that the President has announced that he is entirely satisfied with the conference report, that he wants it to pass, and that it will pass regardless of this debate exactly as it is reported here by the conference committee?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know that. I could not know that, because there is no message to Congress embodying that view, but the messages which the President did deliver to Congress, and which I propose to quote, would controvert such a suggestion.

Mr. BRISTOW. As a matter of fact, has it not been stated in the public prints for days and days, and undenied, that the President is in favor of this conference report, that it meets his views, and that he has no doubt of its being adopted?

Mr. CLAPP. Without intending any reflection upon the public prints, I would hardly accept that statement in the public prints, even though undenied, as refuting the deliberate public utterances of the President made on the platform and in addresses to Congress. I should want some stronger proof than that, and I do not intend it as any reflection at all upon the press.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me further, does not the Senator know in his own heart that there are in this Chamber a dozen Senators, more or less, a dozen approximately, who would vote against this conference report if they did not know that the President wants to have it adopted?

Mr. CLAPP. No; I would not say that. I think there is a force back, beyond, and disassociated with the President. I say in all sincerity that undoubtedly a great many Senators of the dominant party would like to be in harmony with the express views of the President. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] puts himself in that attitude in his present position in opposition to this report, harmonizing, as it does, his position with the heretofore declared utterances of the President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator speaks of the force back of the President. Does he mean the treasurer of the American Shoe Machinery Co.?

Mr. CLAPP. No; I do not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I asked the question, because it is published in the papers, and I agree with the Senator that we can not rely upon information gained solely from that source; but it is published with a good deal of detail and circumstance that in some way or other—I do not know how—the treasurer of that great corporation, with whose action we are all familiar—it has been a public question for a long time—was here in connection with this legislation during the time it was in conference. I know nothing about it, but as the Senator speaks of great forces it occurred to me that possibly he had in mind the forces that have been active in that way.

Mr. CLAPP. I think every man who has been in any way associated with me in the last six years recognizes that the hand of the invisible government is closing down day by day until, quoting again from the late lamented Senator from Iowa, "In its brazen effrontery it has lost its cunning." What this force is, how it meets this situation, how it influences this man or that man, I would not pretend to say; but no student of American conditions can fail to recognize that this invisible bipartisan force, for it knows no party save when it sounds a party slogan to arouse the followers of a party name, surely and certainly is closing down day by day.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I have always thought that I appreciated the guileless and unsuspecting nature of my friend from Minnesota, but he discloses it in a stronger light to-day than I really expected. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not recognize the fact that during the last 8 or 10 or 16 months no important legislation has passed this body or any other body until after it has first been really approved by the President of the United States I think our experience demonstrates that; and if that is so, would it not add very much to the credit which should be given to the current newspaper reports that this conference report was first approved by the President before it came in here?

Mr. CLAPP. Undoubtedly, in a broad general way, the President, to say the least, is not putting forth any effort to defeat this conference report. I say it in all candor and in all sincerity. I do not believe the President realizes what is in this report, and in that sense I repeat I do not believe that he indorses and approves it. As you study this report day by day it discloses more and more the fact that somewhere there has been a complete surrender; items that were good and were put in by the House were stricken out; some items that were good that the Senate put in were stricken out, and we find in this conference report items that are bad that neither House put in. I do not believe, I say with all the force that I can give it, that the President yet realizes, nor do I believe—and it is intended as no reflection upon the Democratic conferees, who alone signed it—that they yet fully realize the complete import of this conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will yield further——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is of the view, as I understand him, that the conference report is directly in antagonism to the plain declarations of the President on the trust question.

Mr. CLAPP. In many vital particulars.

Mr. BRISTOW. In many vital particulars.

Mr. CLAPP. One I was just proceeding to state.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, it must be accepted that the President either does not know anything about what is going on in Congress or he approves this conference report, and I would rather accept the view that he approves it than that he is in utter ignorance of what we are doing, because that is a violent contradiction of what everybody knows to be true.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I do not think we have to accept that alternative. Mr. Wilson has been a student of principles. As I said before, if I had it in my power, every boy in America would read this work on "New Freedom," for while it stops far short in some particulars of being real democracy, it is a wonderful exposition of fundamental principles. The President has been engrossed with the situation with reference to Mexico; he has been engrossed with reference to the European situation. No man can know all that is going on. I do not believe that we are driven to the alternative of either saying broadly that he approves the detail and spirit of this report or else he does not know what is being done. In one sense it is impossible. This Senate and the very Senators who have been discussing this report from day to day, active as they have been—some for a quarter of a century—in the study of this subject, discover from day to day new things in this report. So I do not believe we are driven to the alternative of either in a broad sense saying he does not know it or in a technical sense only that he approves of it.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the President does not know this report which is to be adopted by the majority as it is, is it not time, considering what has been said by the Senator and other distinguished Members of this body, that somebody was advising him as to what is being done here?

Mr. CLAPP. It is time that American Senators rising to the dignity of ambassadors of great States shall take their responsibility for legislation and take the declarations of no man, whether he be within or without the White House. The danger of this one-man power is that no matter how true, how pure, how ideal a man may be in the White House, it is impossible that he shall know all that is going on, and any influence that can surround that situation can work untold injury to this Republic. Therein lies the danger of men humbly bowing their necks to any man who happens to be President of the United States. Therein lies the danger of Senators surrendering their high prerogative as Senators and saying they do this because some man, who can not know as much about it as they, says do so-and-so.

There are men in this body to whom I might refer. Take my distinguished colleague [Mr. NELSON], who for more than 30 years has fought the battles of the people along this line of industrial liberty and freedom in his own State, and has fought those battles valiantly upon this floor, and who was one of the conferees on this bill, but declined to sign the report. Can it be assumed that a man fresh from academic halls and receiving his information only at second hand should be the guiding policy and force to a man who has spent the better part of a lifetime in the study of these problems?

On the passage of this bill and the kindred bills there has been on this floor, for instance, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who for more than a quarter of a century has been in this work. Shall it be said that a man fresh from academic halls knows more of these questions than a man like him?

Therein lies the danger of Congress tamely surrendering and submitting to a man simply because temporarily, and it can only be temporarily, for 8 or 12 years at the outside, happens to be President of the United States?

I wish the American people could realize the danger that lies in this one-man power at the head of the Government and the influences that may surround him. He may be the very embodiment of honor and high ideals, he may be a man who would not consciously swerve one iota, and yet these great forces, with their powerful machinery for putting forward a propaganda, with their alert agents on every hand, may surround that man and he may unconsciously surrender. It is far easier to thus surround one man by sinister influences than it is to surround 90 men. The safety of free government, the basis of free government, is the broad equation and not the narrow apex. It was that apex that man struggled for centuries to get away from that he might get down to this broader equation. As Mr. Wilson so aptly says in one of these lectures, the reforms come from below and not from above.

It is foreign to our theory of government, it is vicious and hostile to the best interests of the American people that any man, I care not who he is, shall have the power by which he can say by a nod of his head what the alleged and expressed convictions of men shall be upon public questions, when those men have spent a lifetime in the study of those questions, men like the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], now home battling for a return to this body, who has literally sacrificed his health, if not shortened his life, in that great struggle.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it true that the President has decided that Congress shall adjourn on October 15?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We read it in the newspapers.

Mr. CLAPP. What the President has decided, in one sense—and I mean it in no sense of disrespect—is immaterial to me. Since I entered this Chamber no man has been the keeper of my conscience, and high as I hold a seat in this great body, I will retire to private life before any man shall become the keeper of my conscience or my judgment. I have perhaps this advantage over some, that I took this same position when the party I was then in harmony with was in power, and I can speak for the freedom of declaration and purpose of a Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I infer from the Senator's very eloquent and forcible remarks that he thinks this bill would not be approved by the Senate if it were not for the influence of the President behind it.

Mr. CLAPP. I think if the President should put his seal of disapproval upon this bill of course it would not be approved by the majority party. I repeat, and I repeat it in all sincerity and candor, it is impossible for the man in the White House to know all that is in this bill.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has stood upon this floor and, in response to the criticism that we do not give the man who is wronged by a trust the right to go into court and rely upon the record of the conviction of that trust, has blandly inquired, "Well, we have not taken from him any of the rights he had before." We have had 18 months of trust agitation and legislation, and now the citizen is told, "Get on your knees and thank a benign and beneficent Providence that you have as many rights as you had when we entered upon this legislative career." Does the Senator from Kansas believe that the President of the United States would say "amen" to that suggestion or that thought? It is in that broad spirit that I say again I do not believe the President realizes the contents, the force, and the scope of this conference report.

Mr. BRISTOW. Since the Senator from Minnesota asks what the Senator from Kansas believes, he will state, by the Senator's permission, that he thinks the President knows all about this conference report, just what it contains and just what it does not, and the President wants to have it passed because it does just what it does; that he now is not in favor of enacting into law the things that he advocated in the "New Freedom"; in other words, that he has surrendered his administration to the sinister influences in this Republic, and from now on there will not be and has not been for half a century an administration so abjectly subservient to the Wall Street influences as the present one.

Mr. CLAPP. I can not stand here and acquiesce in that statement in its fullness. I do believe that the invisible government has fastened upon this administration. I believe that invisible government is tightening its hold day after day, and I believe now what I did not believe when I voted for the Trade Commission bill or for this bill in the Senate, that these bills and the postponed third bill, which will be the great remedy to deal with securities, are part and parcel of a program; but I can not believe that any man possessing the ideals of the President is conscious of this surrender and this betrayal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CLAPP. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the Senator think it is very fortunate that the securities bill, the third bill in the program, has been postponed? Does he not believe that if it had been brought forward and enacted into law it would have been a measure that would have validated all the watered securities that have been set afloat in this country for the last 25 years? Does not the Senator think that the American people are fortunate in having that postponed, considering the experience we are having with this bill?

Mr. CLAPP. Well, I would answer that in this way: I believe in being frank and plain. I believe that eight months ago the one-man power, the party unification, team work, brought the Democratic Party to the verge of a disaster as great as that which overtook the Republican Party from precisely the same cause. I believe that under those conditions, whoever is the personification of this hidden power recognized that there would be in the loss of the prestige of the President and his party an opening of the vision of the American people that would begin to scan these measures, and that that is why that measure probably was abandoned. I believe that same force, emboldened now by the prestige which has come through the misfortunes that have drenched Europe in blood, will again put forth its hand, and if it did, then, as the Senator from Kansas suggests, that bill would probably be another link in the enslavement rather than the breaking of another bar for the freedom and liberation of the American people.

Now, I want to come back to section 2. I was reading what the President said of the vice of local underselling. Some years ago, in what was then called the Northwest, although now it is the Central Northwest, there was an awakening; and I want to say that that sturdy character, my colleague [Mr. NELSON], had much to do with the development of the legislation under that awakening. The people of Minnesota, following the action of Iowa, passed a law relating to local underselling, but of course limited to intrastate traffic, and it was limited to the products of petroleum. That law was subsequently adopted by the States of North and South Dakota, I think Nebraska, and I think also Arkansas. The hearings which we held in 1912, when Mr. Bartles, the head of one of the independent oil companies, came down here, showed how efficient that legislation had been. Not only had it enabled the independents to stand up against the Standard Oil, but it had so broken the monopoly of the Standard Oil that it had loosened its hold upon the railroads.

In former years, Mr. Bartles testified, if he would seek permission from an official of a certain railroad to build a warehouse he would be told in a few weeks that the official regretted it very much, but he could not have the site for the warehouse; but after this law became a fixed fact and had been sustained in the supreme court of that State—and I may say it was subsequently sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States—so thoroughly had the law armed the independents of that locality that even that railroad got out from under the spell of the Standard Oil, and the independents could then secure sites for their little warehouses along the trackage of the railroad.

I can realize how careful men may hesitate to project themselves into an untried zone or pathway of legislative and administrative policy, but here it had been tried and proved effective. That law provided that if a concern sold at one locality for the purpose or with the effect of crushing a competitor or creating a monopoly—not world-wide, as this conference report has it, but a monopoly in a locality—it was prohibited and punishable by law. It was my honor to introduce a bill in the Senate on the 7th of April, 1913.

The House brought over a provision to prevent local underselling which read as follows:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall either directly or indirectly discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof, or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor—

That was a very plain, simple declaration. If the effect was to crush the competitor, then the proof was complete without the question of intent, and the fact of a competitor being crushed out was a matter easy of proof, and the crushing out of the competition in a locality, it would be easy to prove, tended to monopoly in that locality. The bill came over with that provision, and it also contained a provision for imprisonment and fine. The Senate declined to put that provision in. I offered it as an amendment, but after the repeated defeats here to put amendments in the bill I did not ask for a call of yeas and nays upon the amendment. I voted for the bill reluctantly, but in the hope that the House conferees would stand by the House provision. Now, the conferees have put in this provision:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where—

Not where the effect would be to destroy the business of a competitor and create a local monopoly, which would be easy of proof, but they have made a test here that it is absolutely impossible to prove—

where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

But the Senator from West Virginia says we have no right to deal with local monopoly. How can you ever deal with general monopoly until it has assumed proportions that would crush and paralyze the business of the country unless you can deal with it locally? It would be easy to prove that underselling had crushed the competitor, and the crushing of that competitor would be proof that it was tending toward monopoly in that locality; but take the Standard Oil Co., with its world-wide ramifications, will any man say that crushing out a competitor at Bismarck, N. Dak., would tend to create a monopoly in the line of industry and in the line of the Standard Oil business?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAPP. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from Minnesota quotes me as having said that Congress has no power to deal with a local monopoly. The Senator is mistaken in that quotation. I did not say that. I said that a monopoly is a monopoly, and that the only kind of monopoly with which the Congress can deal is one which affects interstate commerce, and that inserting the phrase "in any section or community" adds nothing to the section; or, if it could have any force or effect whatever, it would be to restrict competition. I did not say that Congress did not have that power.

Mr. CLAPP. I may have inadvertently misquoted the language of the Senator from West Virginia, and if so, of course, desire to correct it, but the language the Senator quotes was uttered in response to my criticism that this conference report took out the local monopoly. I will leave it to every Member of the Senate if, in connection with that criticism and his answer, I was not warranted in the statement which I made.

Mr. CHILTON. Of course, the Senator can persist in misquoting me if he desires to do so; but I still say to him that he has misquoted me, and I still repeat what I said originally. Of course, the Senator's peculiar theory could not be upheld, except on the line of argument he is making now, and I do not object to it. I have said what I had to say on this subject, and I still repeat to him that I said only what I repeat now, that a monopoly is a monopoly, and that the Congress can deal with it only as it affects interstate commerce.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I submit that I am warranted in saying that the Senator takes the position that you can not deal with monopoly locally.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. REED. I call the attention of the Senator to section 7, to which the conferees themselves have added to the language of that section in conference the words—or to restrain such commerce in any section or community.

And they have added that language twice in the same section.

Mr. CLAPP. Not only have they taken out the penalty in section 2, but they have actually traveled outside of the declaration of either or both Houses, and provided that it shall only be reprehensible when it tends to establish monopoly in the line of commerce. Several times during this discussion the conferees have insisted that their task was a delicate one; I know that to be true, having often served upon conference committees; but here is a place where a matter is put in that was not within the action of either House of Congress. Neither House prescribed as the reprehensible feature the tendency to monopoly in the line of business. Not only have the conferees taken out the penal clause, but they have practically made it impossible to get any benefit from that provision, for you can not, in a little town where the great Standard Oil Co. reduces its price to crush the independent dealer, prove that the elimination of that little dealer tends to monopoly in the business of the Standard Oil Co.

I see the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is still here. I want to say that I do not believe the President of the United States senses the fact that not only the penalty is taken out of this provision, but the very possibility of a conviction is also eliminated from it. Section 3 prohibited the refusal to sell coal, oil, and similar products. Of course that was not put in by the Senate, and the conferees might have been justified in the last analysis in yielding; but I can not understand how a provision put in by the other House and left out by the Senate could be eliminated without the acquiescence of the Senate conferees. Then there was the second point that occasioned this agitation for more trust legislation—first, local underselling; and, secondly, the refusal to sell to particular purchasers.

We now proceed to the tying-in contract. There was a vice that the court had said it could not reach, because as to patented articles they were not subject to the Sherman antitrust law. The House put in a provision penalizing the tying-in contract. The Senate amended that by applying it to articles patented or unpatented. All that could have been necessary, assuming the loyalty of the House conferees—and we must assume their loyalty—all that was necessary was for the Senate conferees to consent to striking out the words "or unpatented." We would then have had a complete enforceable provision against the tying-in contract as to patented articles; but, instead of that, the conferees put in this language:

Where the effect of such lease, sale, or contract for sale or such condition, agreement, or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

I should like to see the lawyer bold enough to go into court upon a complaint that a tying-in contract at the town of Delphi, Ind., tended to create a monopoly in an industry that had its ramifications from one ocean to the other; and thus the section was emasculated by this, to say nothing of bringing in this new term "substantially." We have had a long experience with the Sherman antitrust law; we have had that law defined and worked out; and all we needed was to take, in the words of Woodrow Wilson, the specific acts which experience had uncovered and developed, and condemn them by legislation and the imposition of a penalty; yet we have here a conference report in which there is no longer the prohibition against the refusal to sell; we have a conference report in which the law against local underselling has been absolutely so emasculated as no longer to make it worth the paper upon which it is written.

We have another provision relating to the tying-in contracts, which, I submit to any man in this body or elsewhere, is rendered nugatory by the difficulty of trying to prove that one contract or lease connected with a patented article would tend to prove a monopoly in a business that had its ramifications throughout the length and breadth of this broad land; yet we are told that the President approves of the details and spirit of this conference report. For one, I say again in all candor and fairness, I can not believe that that is true.

We now come to the effect of the judgment. We have again the views of the President in an address delivered to Congress on the 20th of January, 1914. It requires a long and sustained effort to bring one of these great combinations to the bar of justice; it requires the expenditure of a vast amount of money; and it had seemed to us, and it seemed to the President of the United States, not only in his preconvention, preelection statements, when he had not faced the exigencies that surround that great office, but after he had been in that office for a year it seemed to him that one of the things that was unjust and unfair was that a man injured and wronged by a trust should have to travel over the same road again in his suit for damages that the Government had traversed in bringing the trust to the bar of justice. So he said this to Congress:

It is not fair that the private litigant should be obliged to set up and establish again the facts which the Government has proved. He can not afford, he has not the power, to make use of such processes of inquiry as the Government has command of. Thus shall individual justice be done while the processes of business are rectified and squared with the general conscience.

So a provision was placed in the bill by the Senate which read:

SEC. 4. That a final judgment or decree heretofore or hereafter rendered in any criminal prosecution or in any suit or proceeding in equity brought by or on behalf of the United States under the antitrust laws to the effect that a defendant has violated said laws shall be prima facie evidence against such defendant in any suit or proceeding brought by any other party against such defendant under said laws as to all matters respecting which said judgment or decree would be an estoppel as between the parties thereto.

There were certain of us who wanted to make that judgment conclusive, but the Senate seemed to get somewhat entangled in a maze upon the doctrine of estoppel. The doctrine of estoppel was not involved. If a trust is sued and a judgment is entered against it, of course that judgment is only binding between the parties to the suit; but that judgment is a solemn record and stands there for all time as a judgment of the facts covered by the judgment, and you can not get away from it.

If a judgment were taken against me 25 years ago on a promissory note, the record would be there yet, and, whether it would reflect credit or discredit on me, I can not escape its consequences. It was a question of evidence, and not a question of estoppel; but the Senate took the other view, and provided that such judgments should be only prima facie evidence. Now, what has been done in conference? The provision has been made to read as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees entered before any testimony has been taken: Provided further, That this section shall not apply to consent judgments or decrees rendered in criminal proceedings or suits in equity now pending in which the taking of testimony has been commenced but has not been concluded, provided such judgments or decrees are rendered before any further testimony is taken.

As has been stated by my distinguished colleague [Mr. NELSON], by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and by others, of all forms of judgment, that you have a right to apply against the man against whom the judgment was rendered, is the judgment that the man himself confesses. There is in a plea of guilty no opportunity for passion or prejudice; there is no opportunity for error on the part of the court; the trust comes in and solemnly admits its guilt. It can always plead that judgment as an estoppel in any suit against it as to the matters covered by the judgment, but that judgment can not be used by a litigant who seeks to recover damages at the hands of the trust.

Now we are told that that provision takes away no privilege which the citizen previously had. Imagine the citizen listening to these ringing words of the President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, my friend from Minnesota is always so fair, candid, and honest in everything he says—he has that reputation—that I think, on reflection, he will change his statement. I did say what he says, so far as the amendment is concerned, that no man was deprived of any right that he now has, but I also said that an additional remedy was given to him, in that we provided that judgments in cases hereafter, where testimony has been taken, can be used as prima facie evidence in all cases brought. Therefore we have given to the citizen, in addition to the remedy he now has, an additional remedy, so far as the future is concerned, and we have not taken away by the statute any right which he now has. The Senator is correct in that; but I think, in justice to me, he will admit the correctness of my statement as to the additional right afforded, so far as the future is concerned.

Mr. CLAPP. I myself think that it is pressing a man, perhaps, who ought not to be pressed, and I think, on reflection, that the Senator did not mean to justify 18 months of legislative travail with the declaration that we brought forth a bill that took away no rights from the American citizen. I was going to draw a picture of that and a picture of the citizen as he listens, first, to the address of the President and then to this assurance, but I myself feel that probably it was an inadvertence on the part of the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. The statement was made by way of interruption, that it did not deprive the citizen of any right he now has.

Mr. CLAPP. Does the Senator still justify this change on the ground that after 18 months deliberation we have not taken any right away from the citizen?

Mr. OVERMAN. We have taken no right away, of course.

Mr. CLAPP. Is that the criterion of legislation?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am satisfied the Senator does not understand me at all. The Senator was arguing upon this section of the bill as to the use of the word "hereafter," where it is provided that hereafter a judgment could be used as prima facie evidence, and I said that we had not deprived any citizen of any right he now has.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I was arguing on the proposition that while you leave as to subsequent litigation a prima facie effect upon a judgment that is obtained in the course of litigation, you take away that prima facie effect when the criminal comes into court and solemnly admits his guilt. It was in response to that criticism made by my colleague on the first day of this debate, that the Senator made the reply "We have taken nothing away from the citizen he did not have before."

The vice in that proposition is that while we still make a judgment in litigation instituted hereafter prima facie evidence in a suit brought by a private citizen, we erect a "city of refuge" for the criminal who comes to the court and confesses his guilt. The old Mosaic law did not provide a "city of refuge" for that kind of a criminal. It built its "city of refuge" for the man whose ax slipped from its helve and whose neighbor thereby was slain; the man who sinned by accident could avail himself of this privilege; but here you have erected a "city of refuge," to which the trust magnate can flee by going into court and admitting a judgment pro confesso or pleading guilty in a criminal case and receiving a little fine, and then the great fact of its being a trust, which otherwise would have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars perhaps to establish, but which in its own sense of guilt it has confessed, is withdrawn as an aid to the litigant who has been robbed, ruined, and wrecked by the processes of the trust. Yet you call that "remedial legislation," in the face of the declaration of the President, which I will read again:

It is not fair that the private litigant should be obliged to set up and establish again the facts which the Government has proved.

Again, if it is intended to lead an innocent man to confess a crime, then it violates the very spirit of American law and American justice. You have got to take one horn or the other of this dilemma. If it is held out as an invitation to innocent men to brand themselves with guilt to avoid prosecution, then I say it does violence to the very spirit of our institutions. If it rests upon the theory that the self-confessed criminal can escape the effect of his crime by pleading guilty, then it violates another cardinal principle; and either horn is a violation of the spirit of American government and of American jurisprudence.

With the interruptions that have come I have taken more of the time of the Senate than I had intended. There is, however, one other point which I am going to develop. I want to say again that I do not charge that there is a want of sincerity on the part of the conferees who signed the report, but I believe, in the light of the defense which has been made of this report, that they do not yet comprehend its force and scope. I turn now to section 7 of the conference report, which provides—

That no corporation engaged in commerce shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of another corporation engaged also in commerce where the effect of such acquisition may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporation whose stock is so acquired and the corporation making the acquisition, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community—

Here we find the language so often taken out of the House provisions by the conferees restored in conference in this particular section. Superficially it would seem that perhaps this provision was put there for the purpose of public service, but when you come to analyze that section you find in it the same fatal vice that is apparent in other provisions. I proceed—or tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce.

Of course when it comes to the question of restraint of commerce, an unfair practice, while it lasts, is no restraint of trade; even an unfair practice in the crushing of a competitor may not be a restraint of trade; and so the restraint of trade is limited to the locality where there could be no effective restraint of trade, but the monopoly that would come in that same locality from the crushing of the competitor is delocalized and made general. I read further:

No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of two or more corporations engaged in commerce where the effect of such acquisition, or the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be to substantially lessen competition between such corporations, or any or them, whose stock or other share capital is so acquired, or to restrain such commerce in any section or community.

The act prohibited does not restrain commerce in the particular section or community, but it may make a monopoly in that community; but this provision takes out the locality of the monopoly, and it must be world-wide.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to his colleague?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the attention of my colleague to the frequency with which the words "substantially lessen competition" have been used in this bill.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Is the Senator of the opinion that the insertion of those qualifying words weakens the case?

Mr. CLAPP. I would not only say that they weaken it, but practically emasculate it, and threw us into a zone of uncertainty and doubt of interpretation that will produce varying results from one ocean to the other. The Senator was right when he made the attack upon the word "substantially" the other day. It has no place in this legislation.

It has been found that certain acts do violate the spirit of the antitrust legislation, and the efficient way of dealing with those acts would be found in defining them, prohibiting them, and providing penalties for them. When we reach in this section the provision in regard to the creation of a monopoly, which is or may be a very different thing from restraint of trade—for trade may go on even in larger volume than before—then the words "trade in any section or community" are stricken out, and the words "line of commerce" substituted. While the transaction in one locality would not restrain trade in that locality—trade might even swell at that particular point—how would you ever prove that that transaction tended to create a monopoly in the case of an enterprise, an organization, a trust, whose ramifications and industries perhaps encircled the globe? No; unconsciously—I am constrained to believe—there has been created in this report, from start to finish, a "city of refuge."

I turn now to the concluding paragraphs of this bill. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] had inserted in the bill in the Senate a provision that when a trust was found guilty it should be dealt with just like any other institution, a decree issued for the sale of its effects and the appointment of a receiver.

If this country could once witness one complete triumph of the Government over one single trust we would have less need for trust legislation. The victory of the Government over the Tobacco Trust and over the Standard Oil Trust was complete so far as securing the judgment was concerned. It is due, and it is a pleasure to me on this occasion to pay a tribute to a townsman of mine who was instrumental, in the Standard Oil case, in bringing about that result. Keen and alert, devoting his time and his energy to the task for a long period of time, that great combination was finally brought to the bar of justice. Then what happened? It was put upon a personally conducted excursion which finally resulted in the increased value of the stock of the subsidiary companies that composed that great trust.

The court was not to blame for that. It was the mistake of courts entering the domain of business. There was the fatal error. If we are justified in seeking to prevent trusts, then, appalling as the financial result might have been in the case of the Tobacco Trust—I think it was in that case that the Chief Justice stated the reasons why a decree of sale should not be entered—far-reaching as the effect of that decree might have been, one such decree, one such effect, would have done more to deter the creation and maintenance of trusts in this country than all the legislation we can enact.

Now, after 18 months of legislation we have a Trade Commission which violates a principle which was one of the cardinal features of the campaign of 1912. We have this Clayton bill, so called, the antitrust bill, with a report of the conferees that absolutely strips it of its strength, of its vigor, and of its value. There has been a mistake made here on the part of some in assuming that this involves the conferees. The conferees went out and brought in their report, and now it is for the Senate to say whether or not we will accept the report. Its rejection is no reflection upon the conferees. Its rejection is simply the declaration of the attitude of the Senate itself. I, for one, hope that the Senate will be able to reject this report; that whatever this mysterious force is that to-day is closing down upon this Government, it may here meet a Waterloo; that whatever that force may be in its personal equation, it will find that it is unsafe to put forth its tentacles to smother the aspirations, the hopes, and the purposes of the American people.

In the words of the President we stand at the "parting of the ways." We shall either go forward in that great work begun years ago, and justified by the experience of our people, and justified in the very cardinal tenet of free government itself—the necessity of regulation to hold back and repress those who would commit wrong—or we shall go back, and let this Government lapse into the hands of these great forces.

I, for one, do not believe the American people will stand for the latter. I realize now that they are in a measure somewhat disposed to follow not the language of these reports, but the language of these great speeches and great essays that were delivered by the President of the United States, and under the spell of those speeches and lectures they fondly dream that those policies are being carried out. But what would the man say, I repeat, the citizen of this country, who listened to Woodrow Wilson when before the assembled Houses of Congress he solemnly declared that the American citizen was entitled to the fruits of the litigation that the Government had carried on against the trusts, to be calmly told now that while he is not given those fruits, no liberties, no rights, of his have been taken from him?

No; I do not believe, with the Senator from Idaho, that the American people have abated their interest in this struggle for industrial and commercial liberty. It has cost too much. It cost the American people the life of that great Senator from Iowa, Mr. Dolliver, who truly fell a martyr to the cause of industrial liberty. It has cost the health of that other great Senator from Iowa, Mr. CUMMINS; and it has cost, I fear, too permanently, the health and strength of one who has not been able in this struggle upon this conference report to lend his voice, his heart, and his purpose to the cause of the people, Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He suffers to-day from the sacrifice he has made for industrial liberty and commercial freedom. All over this land the people realize this cost and these sacrifices; and while they may be for the time confused by this bewildering maze of legislation, while they may be for the time being enthralled by the glowing sentences that were uttered upon the platforms before election, and to Congress before legislation took shape, I believe that when they come to realize that this sinister force has exerted its influence and has played its part in this legislation, there will be an awakening—a revolt by the side of which the awakening and revolt of two years ago was but the prelude.

I thank the Senate for its kind indulgence. I did not intend to speak so long, although the interruptions have somewhat prolonged my remarks.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a unanimous-consent agreement which I propose in regard to the report of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'GORMAN in the chair). The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on to-morrow, Saturday, October 3, 1914, The Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon the disposition of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill H. R. 15657, "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies," and so forth.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator from Texas——

Mr. CULBERSON. I was about to suggest that I think the proposition is within the spirit of the rule recently adopted by the Senate, and that a roll call is necessary.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think a roll call will not be necessary. I shall not object if at the close of to-day's session we have not reached a vote; but I do not feel that at this time, with some two hours and a half before us, we ought to preclude ourselves from voting this afternoon.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, a point of order. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement can not be concluded, under the rules, without a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Texas to make it the same hour next Monday.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Secretary to change it to Monday, October 5.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on Monday——

Mr. CULBERSON. How would it suit the Senator to fix it at 2 o'clock Monday, instead of 4 o'clock?

Mr. NELSON. I think we had better have it at 4 o'clock. That will give us ample time.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this unanimous-consent agreement can not be made without a roll call.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have suggested that, in my judgment, it is within the spirit of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state that unanimous consent can not be granted without a call of the roll, but that if there be an affirmative objection, as was suggested a moment ago by the Senator from Minnesota, that disposes of the matter without a call of the roll.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I gather from the suggestions of the Senators that we would not reach a vote this afternoon, anyhow, and I therefore withdraw any objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think we had better have a roll call on this proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ASHURST.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no objection to the roll call, of course, but I wish to offer a suggestion to the Senator from Texas.

I do not want to delay the passage of this bill one moment beyond the time when the Senate is ready to vote. If I were sure the Senate would be in session to-morrow, and we would have a quorum here, so that the consideration of this bill would go on, I should say that the time fixed in the suggestion of the Senator—Monday—was long enough. What I am fearful of is that we will meet here to-morrow morning, having this unanimous-consent agreement, Senators understanding that there will be no vote until Monday——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state to the Senator that under the language of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement a vote may be taken at any time, even to-day, because it provides that a vote shall be taken not later than at 4 o'clock on either Saturday or Monday, as the case may be.

Mr. REED. I understand that that is the language, but my experience with these unanimous-consent agreements is that as soon as a unanimous-consent agreement is made fixing an hour, deliberation at once ceases until very shortly before that hour. Now, to-morrow being Saturday, with the very small number of Senators now in Washington, and with the extreme probability that to-morrow morning we may develop the lack of a quorum, I doubt the wisdom of making this agreement. I do not want to be put in the position of objecting. It seems to me that if the Senator would ask for this consent some time to-morrow we would grant it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr President, is the request for unanimous consent now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it subject to objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I object.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to know what the request was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request for unanimous consent is that the Senate proceed to vote on the pending measure not later than 4 o'clock either to-morrow or on Monday, and an objection has been made by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator object to Monday?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I object to any attempt to facilitate the passage of this bill. I feel that it is not a good bill, that it is not desirable legislation, that it is uncalled for, and amounts to a practical abandonment of the Sherman antitrust law. This I greatly regret, and will not give my consent to such a reckless purpose. I am still hoping that there may be some interposition of Providence to prevent the consummation of this Democratic surrender of a great fundamental principle of government. I object.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I desire to give expression to a few thoughts that have come to me with reference to this bill. I present no thoughts of law, for I have none to express; but what matters it, Mr. President, for a million men and more in this land have never heard of Blackstone, and they care naught for his doctrines or teachings, and yet they are splendid citizens and stout defenders of this Republic. In fact, there are multitudes who have contempt for man-made and man-written law.

I feel that the passage of this bill will tend to increase their prejudices, for a law to be respected must be just and must be impartial. This measure, as I read it, is not impartial to the citizens of our land. Our citizens as a mass believe in God's law of eternal justice, and for this they will contend.

This bill as it comes from the conference committee does not give this to our countrymen. Mr. President, I have been in almost constant attendance in my seat during the sessions of the Senate. I have participated in the discussion on and voted for or against the various amendments that have been proposed to this measure—the Federal antitrust bill. I did not vote for or against these amendments as a partisan. No thought of Democrat or Republican ever entered my mind. I voted as a Senator of the United States, free from selfish purpose or animus. I voted for this measure because I believed it would bring relief from a condition which was bearing heavily on and destroying independent business throughout the length and breadth of our country. I voted for it because, as a citizen of New Jersey, I had seen the evil of the trust system. For years I had been appealed to by my fellow citizens asking if something could not be done to bring relief.

Mr. President, I voted for this bill because I had pledged my fellow citizens that I would vote to stay and punish the arch-conspirators and violators of law. I pledged my fellow countrymen that I stood on this subject with the declarations of Woodrow Wilson, insisting on personal guilt, that these violators of the law should serve time behind the bars. Now, imagine my great surprise and dissatisfaction when I find the penalties are practically withdrawn.

I have been told by Senators for whom I have the greatest respect, both for their legal ability and their political principles, that it was my political duty to stand by this report. This, Mr. President, I repel and deny. I deem it my duty to stand by that which I deem right, and this thought has prompted every vote I have cast in this body. I had felt that this report should be sent back to conference, that it might be shaped and molded to the interests of justice and in harmony with our party's promises.

So jealous and earnest was I in regard to the wisdom of passing the so-called Clayton bill, and so conscientiously did I vote for its provisions inflicting penalties on wrongdoers, that I now view with alarm the omission of these penalties from the conference report. I do not seek the death of the measure, but I seek to make it stronger. I fear that to adopt the conference report will so weaken the measure as to destroy it.

Mr. President, I am admonished by friends that there is much in this bill of value to labor, and hence it is my duty to stand by it. As I read the measure, there is no more there than rightly belongs there, and not a word more than labor richly and honestly deserves. Nor do I believe there is a Member of this body nor of the House who would vote to detract a word therefrom that would tend to place in jeopardy the rights of labor. I have no fears upon this score from recommitment.

Mr. President, other kindly disposed friends have urged upon me that it would be well at this time to ease up on the penalty clauses. Let me recite to the Senate a little experience that came under my observation in my own State:

Two young men had gathered together a few thousand dollars. They chose to embark in the tobacco and cigar business. After a short experience, a store of the United Cigar Stores Co., an offshoot of the Tobacco Trust, located near by and proceeded to cut prices to a ruinous degree. As time wore on the little capital of the boys fast faded out. Finally, for some infraction, either real or fancied, of the revenue laws, the firm was closed out, the little stock confiscated, and the young merchants were out of business because they had violated the laws of the great United States. A reprimand would never do, they were told. "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" was the inexorable decree of the law; and to-day these young men are in business no more.

In the face of this tale you ask me to vote for a measure that will administer a gentle "Go thou, and sin no more" to the great violators of our law. No, Mr. President, I can not, I will not. Further, let me state that all this happened within a few miles of the gorgeous home and glorious gardens of some 3,000 acres, which fairly rival the splendors and beauty of Babylon of old, the home of Duke, the president of the Tobacco Trust. Ah, no!—a thousand noes! I would not dare face my fellow citizens. I have too often inveighed against this evil to shut my eyes now, stop my ears, and still my tongue against the cruel and the horrid wrongs that have been perpetrated against my countrymen.

I feel that I violate no confidence in this presence when I state to the Senate that in a conversation only yesterday with the author of this original bill, Judge Clayton, he did not hesitate to express his sincere regret and disappointment that the penalties embodied in the bill had been eliminated. I appeal, let the Senate of the United States insist that these penalties that have been eliminated in conference shall be restored as they came from the brain and the hands of its illustrious and patriotic author.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I am not certain that I understood one statement he made. Do I understand the Senator to say that Judge Clayton, the author of this bill, or the chairman of the committee that reported it, had made some request or statement about it?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. He made no request. It was simply in conversation. I will say that I have great admiration for the patriotism and the splendid ability of Judge Clayton. I met the judge yesterday in company with his wife, and naturally the topic turned on what we were doing in the Senate. I said: "We are thrashing over the Clayton bill. Is that a familiar sound to you?" "Oh, yes," said he. I said: "It has been changed somewhat, since it came out of conference, from the bill as it was first presented. The penalty clauses have been decidedly and sadly eliminated." To which he responded: "Yes; I view with deep regret and disappointment the fact that that is the case."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, for the purpose of setting the Senator from New Jersey right about a matter as to which he seems to be in error, as I am sure he desires to be correct about it, I desire to say to him that the penalties were all taken out of the bill on the floor of the Senate and not by the committee.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, they are out to-day; and, by the eternal gods, I will not vote for any measure that will not put them back again. That is the way I feel about it. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER rapped for order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move that the further consideration of this conference report be postponed until the first Monday in December, 1914, and I wish to give my reasons for this request for postponement.

For five days now our most able Senators, the best lawyers in the Senate, those who can talk most rapidly and most concisely, have been presenting the evil elements in this bill. If it has taken those Senators five days to enumerate the vicious points in the bill, it is quite evident that it will take some time to explain each one of the propositions that have been presented, and it will require some time for us to absorb the information concerning it. Now, while this is going on the Democratic members of another committee are considering the matter of levying a special tax to collect another hundred million dollars from the American public.

Mr. President, you will see the evil of considering any matter by a mere partisan portion of a conference or any other committee. The conference report now before the Senate evidences the trouble that naturally follows when our Democratic friends refuse to consider any suggestions from the Republican side or from the Republican members of the same conference.

I fear the consideration of this measure will take up considerable of the time between now and the date of a proposed adjournment. While we are discussing this conference report the Democratic members of the Committee on Finance, behind closed doors, are concocting new schemes of taxation. As we the Republican members of that committee are not invited to meet with them, I purpose to take occasion now to present some thoughts and facts for their consideration, presenting the Republican view, with the hope that at least they will be read, if not considered, by the Democratic members of that committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. In regard to the Senator's motion, I should like to ask him whether he proposes to press it this evening or whether he will allow it to be pending.

Mr. McCUMBER. I purpose to allow it to be pending beyond this evening.

Mr. President, the Government must not be allowed to disclose an empty or bankrupt Treasury. Its bills must be paid as they become due. An acknowledgment of its inability to meet demands upon it would be a calamity. This condition, however, is close at hand in this country, and we are called upon to meet it. The question now is, How shall that condition be met? How shall that catastrophe be avoided? There are only two ways—increase the burden of taxation on a people who are already suffering from the stagnation of business due to your tariff law of 1913, or give your note, bearing a small rate of interest, for the necessary amount to meet the deficit, until you can reinstate the old policy which was raising a sufficient revenue to run the Government. A sensible man, dealing with his own private matters, would not hesitate a single moment as between this greater and this lesser evil. He would reason thus: If I borrow the $150,000,000, my interest charges, which are losses, will be $450,000 annually; but if I continue the present revenue policy I will continue to lose $150,000,000 annually. I will give the note and change the policy at the earliest possible moment. That, Mr. President, is the conclusion this Congress, representing the interest of all the people, ought to reach to-day. But there is little hope of changing a policy which has been inaugurated until the administration which espouses that policy has been changed for another, and that will require two years more. But we can far better afford to lose the little interest upon the bonds for a couple of years than to tax the people the equivalent of the whole principal each year.

INFLATION PRESCRIPTION.

Mr. President, Democratic policies have now been in operation just one year, and the old condition which has always marked the fiscal policy of the country under the control of that party has again resulted, first, in business stagnation all over the country; second, in expenses greater than income; and, third, in the usual attempt to meet the situation by inflating the currency by turning out a billion or so of extra paper dollars.

But, Mr. President, your inflation prescription not only will not be a remedy at all, but it will create an ill which in the end will require most drastic and painful treatment for its cure. The time will come when we shall either have to redeem this excessive issue of paper dollars or commit the unforgivable crime against the whole country of grossly cheapening the savings of all the people.

Mr. President, we have all the money in the United States necessary to conduct all of its business. We have more dollars available for circulation to-day than ever before in our history; but they are idle dollars. What we need is not more dollars, but a policy that will banish the feeling of dread and give confidence to the business of the country.

The conditions are similar to and we have the same old controversy we had in 1896, when the same Democratic tariff policies had laid their blight on all our industries.

Mr. Bryan, representing the Democratic idea, then said: What the country needs is more dollars.

Mr. McKinley, representing the Republican idea, said: What the country needs is more business.

Mr. Bryan said: Open up the mints of the country to the free coinage of the silver of the world and that will make business.

Mr. McKinley said: Open up the mills of the country to the free coinage of American labor and enterprise and that will make business.

Mr. Bryan said: We want more circulating medium to create business.

He did not explain how we would start that medium circulating.

Mr. McKinley said: We want more business to circulate the money we now have.

Mr. Bryan's philosophy was: Create bricks and people will build houses.

Mr. McKinley's philosophy was: Create the demand for homes and the bricks will be forthcoming.

These two schools of philosophy fairly reflect the Republican and Democratic ideas of the relation between money and business. Business to-day is very dull, very stagnant, and our Democratic friends expect to revive it by filling the country with paper money.

Of course, we all agree that our monetary system should have a proper degree of elasticity to meet great fluctuations in demands in different sections of the country. But elasticity and inflation are very different propositions. That difference, however, does not seem to have been recognized in the laws that have lately been passed by this Congress. All of our banking and currency measures passed at this session of Congress spell inflation. They provide for easy methods of expansion which will respond to every possible speculative demand, but no effective and potent provision to force a contraction back to the normal.

The Vreeland-Aldrich currency measure was an emergency measure pure and simple, designed to meet and avert a panic or a run upon the banks. The emergency currency which might be issued under its provisions was burdened with such an increasing tax as would compel its retirement the moment the crisis had passed. In your last measure you have so relieved the issue from this safety brake that the money will be issued by the banks, not to meet contemplated runs, but to be loaned at a profit and to support shaky speculative ventures until their stocks can be loaded off on the public.

Of course, Mr. President, you have provided for a continuing or permanent inflation by your amendments. Of course, each individual bank will in time be compelled to redeem its issue; but as one bank redeems another bank will be issuing without restraint or charge for a number of months; and in that way the country will be filled with this emergency currency. You are debasing the value of the people's money and you will not start a wheel moving by this expedient.

Mr. President, so long as a man can borrow on his note, spend the proceeds, and relieve his mind from the fact that there will come a pay day, he may forget his real condition. But opiates do not cure. Intoxicants, though they may make us oblivious for a time, do not change real conditions. Inflation, though it may postpone a collapse, was never known to avert one. On the contrary, it makes recovery from them far more difficult.

TARIFF ACT, NOT WAR, CAUSED DEFICIT.

Let us get at the root of this disease for which you are prescribing a combination of inflation and war tax. Let us ascertain its cause and then apply the remedy that will reach that cause.

You say the cause of our deficit is the European war. Undoubtedly that has increased it; but you well know that long before this war, while your imports were increasing, while they were supplanting the products of this country, thereby depressing and destroying our business and prosperity, your revenues from such imports were decreasing, making it inevitable that you would have to levy further taxes on a people correspondingly less able to pay that tax.

Mr. President, I can not compare year with year in order to obtain the full operation of your new tariff bill. This act was not signed until October 4, 1913, and did not even then go into effect on all of its items. I know, too, that we can not judge a law by the conditions which immediately precede or follow it, because cautious business either anticipates or pauses to learn its purport; but it is safe to say that business had adapted itself to the new condition and had become normal under that condition within six months from its enactment, or about April 1, 1914. Comparing the normal conditions of April, 1913, under a Republican tariff law with normal conditions of April, 1914, under a Democratic tariff law, we find:

During the month of April, 1913, our importations were	$146,194,461
During the month of April, 1914, our importations were	173,896,476
Excess of importations, April, 1914	27,702,015

That means that we bought just $27,702,015 more goods from abroad under the new tariff law than under the old during the corresponding months.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is giving the date in April. Will he undertake to look at the figures for the 1st day of June?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have them all, and I will give them all. I will say to the Senator that it is my purpose to make my remarks as brief as possible, and when I have concluded I will then reply to any queries. I shall give the figures for all the months.

That means also that we sent just that much more money out of the country. That means also that our products were displaced by just that much of the foreign product; and that means again that our producers lost their profit on that amount of productions and that our laborers were deprived of from 50 to 70 per cent of that sum in wages.

Now, let us see how our exports and sales abroad came out during these two periods. Of course, if we sold as much more abroad as we bought from abroad the two items would equalize our condition, but just the reverse happened:

During the month of April, 1913, we exported	$199,813,438
During the month of April, 1914, we exported	162,550,870
Loss in exports, April, 1914	37,262,568

That means that we produced just that much less to sell abroad. We lost profits on that much of production and our laborers lost their proportionate share of wages.

So you see under the provisions of this bill we get it both coming and going, and when we balance our monthly purchase and sales account with April of the previous year we find:

Increase of purchases, $27,702,015; decrease of sales, $37,262,568; or a loss in trade as compared with the previous April of $64,964,583. Comparing in the same way the month of May, 1914, with May, 1913, we find our losses in trade were $63,360,605; comparing June, 1914, with June, 1913, we find our losses in trade were $32,616,445; or a total loss in those three months in our balance of trade account of $160,941,633.

At the same rate of losses for a year—and, remember, this was before our trade was affected by any war—our losses would amount to $640,000,000. That, Mr. President, is how the Democratic tariff act was operating on the American people and on American trade before the flame of war burst in fury over suffering Europe.

Not only this, Mr. President, but since April 1, 1914, every month has shown a balance of trade against us. We bought more abroad than we sold abroad. This trade balance against us by months is as follows:

April	$11,345,606
May	2,476,896
June	653,522
July	6,095,908
Total for the 4 months, all before the European war	20,571,923

At the same rate throughout the year without the intervention of this war our balance of trade would have been more than $61,000,000 against us as compared with $652,875,915 in our favor during the year ending June 30, 1913. That is the difference between a Democratic and a Republican tariff bill.

USELESS EXTRAVAGANCE.

Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that with the present administration in control of both branches of Congress we can not hope for an immediate change of the policy which brought on the trouble. We can not remove our patient from the malarial atmosphere of Democracy, but we can discontinue some of the causes. We can stop our useless extravagances which necessitate the immediate demand of war taxes on a nation at peace. I am not finding fault that you paid no attention to your platform declaration of rigid economy. I knew as well as you did that this plank in your platform was for the purpose of catching the votes of those guillible enough to take stock in such declarations. I knew as well as you did that the needs of this country demand appropriations aggregating about a billion dollars annually, no matter what administration is in control. So I paid no attention to these mere preelection, demagogic promises; but with this platform which pledged the Democratic Party to reduce expenses we did have a right to believe that the governmental expenses would not be greatly increased.

This is the way you have kept your pledge; this is the way you have, with self-lauding virtue, checked what you declared Republican extravagances and established Democratic economy: Notwithstanding the fact that you have failed to make any appropriation for public buildings, those permanent improvements which save the country vast expenses in rents and for which we could well afford even to borrow money to construct and for which millions annually were appropriated by the Republican administrations; notwithstanding in many instances you have failed to appropriate where appropriations would be justified; notwithstanding the fact that after a long and determined battle your "pork-barrel" rivers and harbors bill was forced down $33,000,000; notwithstanding the fact that the nearly completed canal saved you about $15,000,000; notwithstanding the fact that the death roll of our old soldiers saved you another $11,000,000—notwithstanding all these diminished necessities, still your appropriations for the fiscal year, when summed up and put through as you expect, will exceed your so-called extravagant Republican appropriations for the preceding year by about $100,000,000.

And notwithstanding the fact that you reached the hand of direct taxation into the pockets of the American people and drew from them an extra $30,813,640 from incomes and $47,283,714 corporation taxes for the last fiscal year, still you admit that you must reach for another $100,000,000. This much for your boasted economy.

And what, Mr. President, is the nature of these expenditures for which we must now levy a war tax on the people? I shall not go into the endless array of expenditures, the many, very many new commissions, with one hand in the Treasury and the other attempting to caress business into an assurance that, notwithstanding its power, it really does not intend to kill, but gently lead it into the Nirvana of altruism. I shall not attempt to enumerate the vast increases in the employees of the Capitol to give places to political friends, nor the unceasing attempts to override the civil-service law that places might be found for partisan followers. I shall instance but one fair illustration of this reckless extravagance—the Alaskan railway appropriation. Forty millions are appropriated for the building of this railway. Its equipment ready for use will be at least another forty millions, or eighty millions in all. There have been a few railroads built in Alaska and some are still in operation. None of them have ever had business enough to pay running expenses, and yet the Government is to expend this vast sum, which would probably be double what the same road could be built for by private enterprise—build it where even the more cheaply constructed railroads have not secured business enough to pay expenses and keep them in operation. It is estimated that the contemplated line would serve four or five thousand white people, an equivalent of about $20,000 for each person to be benefited.

So, Mr. President, what we can do to-day, and what we ought to do, is to stop our extravagances. Appropriate liberally and fairly for the Government's real needs, but cut out these excesses. Open up Alaska's resources to individual enterprise under proper and reasonable governmental control, so that those railroads that are now rotting will have business to do. Then repeal your Alaskan railway scheme and save $40,000 immediately and many times that in the long run.

TAX UNNECESSARY.

What is the next thing you ought to do? Use the money you now have in the Treasury and not tax the people by every possible means while this money is lying idle. Of course, you have not the balance in the Treasury that was there when you took charge of the Government. No one expected you to do that. But use what you have and then issue just enough bonds to take care of the rest. But you say we have to deposit $75,000,000 in our banks scattered over the country to check any panicky feeling that may exist and to assure business that there is sufficient money in the country to tide it over during this period of stagnation. The answer to that is: Remove the condition which causes the uncertainty and stagnation and then you can use these deposits.

But again you say you need the money in the country to supply the demand of the several sections for currency. Well, just answer me this: Will not your new war tax, according to your own estimates, draw $105,000,000 from circulation in the country and put it into the Treasury? What, then, does the country gain by scattering $75,000,000 of Government funds among the bankers of the country with one hand while you draw $105,000,000 from the people out of the same country with the other hand?

But, Mr. President, even these remedies are but temporary expedients. The only permanent remedy is to remove the cause for both the business depression and the deficit. Repeal your tariff law and reinstate the one which gave you both prosperity and revenue.

It is worse than useless to deny the general condition of business stagnation. You may seek to ease yourself or relieve yourself from responsibility by calling it a psychological condition, but it is here. The war is not the cause. On the contrary, except for this war the depression would be much greater. While this war has depressed the price of some of our stable products, it has generally increased the price. By checking importations from abroad it has assisted our home manufacturers to some extent temporarily; but, Mr. President, no one knows how long this devastating war can last before one side or the other is exhausted; and the business of the country must be able to see a vista of opportunity beyond this war cloud before it can assume a healthful activity.

VAST LOSSES TO PEOPLE AND COUNTRY.

I now want to show, Mr. President, the vast losses to this country and its people due to your last tariff act as it affects a few only of our leading industries, and from that you can form some estimate as to the total losses.

Your Democratic tariff law went into effect October 4, 1913. It was therefore in force less than nine months on June 30, 1914, the end of the fiscal year. It did not go into effect on sugar until March 1, 1914. I have a table here which gives the duties under the two tariff laws; the amount and value of products imported under each during corresponding months—that is, from October 1, 1912, to June 30, 1913, under a Republican administration and tariff law, and from October 1, 1913, to June 30, 1914—together with the duties collected. I want to call attention right here to the fact that both of these periods antedate the war, and our commerce was not affected by it. The table shows the normal working of your tariff act. I ask leave to insert here the table, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission to do so is granted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in addition to the articles mentioned in this table, there was collected a duty in 1913 on sugar of $53,354,427. Under your act of October 4, 1913, you reduced the tariff on sugar about 25 per cent, to take effect March 1, 1914, and after 1916 sugar is to be admitted free. The duty on sugar under the old law since March 1 would have been about $5,000,000 per month. The loss of revenue to the Government by the enactment of the Democratic tariff law is therefore about $1,250,000 per month from March 1, or a loss of over $6,000,000 for the last four months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. For the next fiscal year the loss of revenue will be about $15,000,000, and after that from $55,000,000 to $60,000,000 per annum.

From this table it will be seen that while our imports increased on these articles alone during the last period in the sum of $99,556,029 our revenues decreased $26,580,649.

Now, what did this mean to the American people? It meant—

First. That products of other countries in excess of what had been previously imported and most of which could have been produced in this country and all of which, with the exception of precious stones, could, with proper protection, be produced in this country, of the value of over $99,000,000, displaced so much of the American product.

Second. That this displacement deprived our own people of the profits of that production.

[1] Wheat under 1913 law is free except for countervailing duty of 10 cents per bushel from countries imposing a duty on American wheat. Canada is the only country affected, and hence only imports from that country are estimated.

[2] Fresh meats include fresh beef, veal, mutton, and pork only.

[3] Fish. The duty under 1909 law was specific duty on different kinds, and therefore the rate is based on the averaged ad valorem rate of year ending June 30, 1913. Under 1913 law a small duty is levied on certain smoked and packed-in-oil fish, and the amount of duty collected is estimated at about 5 per cent of total importations, as in previous year.

[4] Flax and hemp. Manufactures of cotton and other articles indicated by (4) had various specific and ad valorem duties of 1909 and are computed on the average ad valorem rate of duty for the year ending June 30, 1913. The rate of duty under law of 1913 is computed on the average ad valorem rate collected under 1913 law for six months ending Mar. 31, 1914, as computed by the Department of Commerce.

[5] Leather. Under the law of 1913 all leather except "glove leather" and "chamois" is free of duty, and the duty collected on those two items under the 1913 law is estimated on the basis of importation of those articles for the previous years.

[6] Precious stones. The 1913 law increased the duty on these articles 100 per cent, and it appears that importations decreased over 50 per cent. There has been no noticeable decrease in the supply of those articles. Therefore it is fair to presume that importations are either undervalued or smuggling has greatly increased, and the result has been a 10 per cent loss of revenue by increasing the duty 100 per cent.

Third. Assuming that two-thirds of the value of these products were represented by labor, it deprived our own laborers of that much wages.

Fourth. That it decreased the purchasing power of these producers and laborers just that much to buy the products of other American producers.

Fifth. That we sent just that many millions of dollars out of this country, only a small proportion of which will come back to purchase our commodities, while the greater proportion would have been available for such purchases if the money had been expended at home.

Sixth. That while those losses to the people were going on the Government lost $69,534,916 in income, the extra amount of revenue which would have been collected on the same importations under the old law.

Seventh. That while the Government was losing the income from foreign importations the people were being burdened with an extra tax on incomes amounting to $30,813,640 yearly, and an additional corporation tax of $47,233,714.

Eighth. That while our people are being burdened with all these losses occasioned by this un-American, this nonprotective policy, we are now seeking other ways, heretofore applied only in stress of war, to tax the public. After reducing the earnings of the people by your "tariff-for-revenue-only" policy, which has failed even to produce the revenue, you are now reaching into their pockets for their small change; and Ninth. Not one single benefit has been derived by the people, not one penny of reduction in the cost of living to the ultimate consumer.

But you say that if you have increased direct taxes on the people by $78,097,354 at the end of the last fiscal year you have relieved them of this $26,580,649 which you lost in tariff taxes. Not so, Mr. President. If, as you claim, the tariff is paid by the ultimate consumer in the higher price he pays for the things he purchases, then by the removal of the duty and the loss to the Government of this more than $26,000,000 of tariff revenue the ultimate consumer should be able to purchase these things at a lower price. But you can not point out one single thing that he buys cheaper by reason of this tax having been remitted to the foreign importer. It is a total loss to the Government without a single corresponding benefit to the people, but with innumerable consequential evils, as I have shown.

Mr. President, a further perusal of this table will show that had the old tariff rates been applied to these importations during the nine months you would have secured a duty of $131,457,337 instead of $61,832,421, the amount actually collected. That would have made a difference of $69,534,916. That would have reduced your deficit $69,534,916.

I have not lost sight of the fact that with the old rates the importations would have been less on which they would operate; but, Mr. President, even with less importations we would have had greater income; and not only that, with an assured home market for our products all of our people would have been better able to meet any taxes the exigencies of a foreign war might in time impose upon us.

There could have been no possible question that with the old Republican tariff law in force there would have been plenty of cash in the Treasury to meet all expenses of government and two months of foreign war would not have caused a deficit of a hundred million dollars.

THE AMERICAN FARMER AND THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

So much, Mr. President, for the cause which compels us to levy a war tax and the remedy which will relieve us from it—the issuance of certificates of indebtedness or bonds during a period of stagnation. I now want you to look at another feature of the case. I want the American farmer and the Democratic Party to better know and understand each other.

Mr. President, it is bad enough to so legislate as to seriously affect the prosperity of the whole country; but it is far worse to single out some particular industry or some particular section of the country for such adverse legislation; and infinitely worse than either, to select a section or class whose earnings are already far below that of other sections or classes.

Mr. President, with the enormous disproportion between the increase of wealth and earnings in the city as compared with that of the country, with city labor earning many times higher wages than farm labor, and in the light of the well-known truth that it costs the farmer many more hours of labor to produce any given quantity of farm products than it costs the city laborer in hours to purchase them, one would naturally suppose that if the legislative arm of the Government should be extended to support the interest of any class of our people it should be stretched forth to lift agricultural industries to a plane of equality with other great industries of the country.

But what are the facts? In 1912 a great campaign was on. The Democratic Party wanted votes. It knew there were twice as many votes in the city as in the country. It knew that the high cost of living complained of in the city was due entirely to the everlasting increase of values and extravagances in the city life and that farmers' prices for their raw products had nothing to do with it. But policy was more potent than right, and so that party said to the cities, said to the people whose earnings were manyfold higher than the farmers, said to those people who had ten times as many luxuries and amusements: "These farmers are receiving too much for their grain, their wool, their cattle, butter, and eggs. You people in the city are paying too much for your food products. We will make the farmer sell them cheaper. He shall have no protection. That will leave you more to satisfy your cravings for amusements and other extravagances." It did not say to the city denizen: "Just cut down your liquor and cigar and theater and other amusement bills and use that money to buy the farmer's product, who does not have any of these luxuries and amusements." It did not say to the city matron: "Just drop for a time that $100 gown and buy one for $20, and the difference will go a long way to pay the housewife 20 cents for a pound of butter."

Well, through a division in the Republican ranks the Democratic Party came into power, and I will give it credit for one thing. It kept its word in so far as it was able to deal a blow at the farming interest. Out of 22 leading agricultural products of the Northwest, 17 were placed upon the free list and the others reduced not less than 60 per cent.

PRACTICALLY ALL NORTHERN FARM PRODUCTS PLACED ON FREE LIST.

I have a table here showing the reduction on farm products. Every northwestern man, be he business man, professional man, or farmer, Democrat or Republican, ought to study this table, which shows how the Democratic Party, with all its fury, swooped down on the northwestern industries. Then it would be instructive to compare the reductions on other products with the reductions on agricultural products, and again to see how the southern agricultural products fared as compared with the northern agricultural products.

Here is the table, Mr. President, which I ask may be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Northern products.

Articles.	Payne-Aldrich law, 1909.	Underwood law, 1913.	Per cent decrease.
Animals, for food	20 per cent	Free	100
Bacon and ham	4 cents per pound	do	100

Wool	11 cents per pound	do	100

Mr. McCUMBER. All food animals, all kinds of meat, corn, cream, milk, eggs, rye, wool, and even flax straw, are placed on the free list; are compelled to compete against the products of the entire world. There is a slight duty on wheat and potatoes as between this country and Canada only, the only thing we succeeded in saving, and even that is not due to Democratic desires, but the failure of Canada to remove her countervailing duties on the same articles.

IMMENSE INCREASE OF IMPORTATION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Now, what effect did this placing of all the northwestern products on the free list have upon our importations, and consequently upon the price which we otherwise would have received? Even our Democratic friends will admit that the price of a commodity depends upon the supply and demand in the field of consumption, and if we enormously increase the supply it must necessarily greatly decrease what we otherwise would receive.

Here is a table showing the enormous increase in the importation of a few articles during the corresponding period of the operation of the two laws—the Democratic tariff law from the date of its enactment, October, 1913, to June 30, 1914, the old law of the corresponding period from October, 1912, to June 30, 1913. I will ask to insert this table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Excess in value of these importations under the Democratic tariff law, $48,186,728.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, I want Senators to listen to this—you who claim that the farmer is not benefited by the tariff, and that it will make no difference about his prices and the importations. I especially call your attention to four items.

Fresh meats increased from about 4,000,000 pounds to about 183,000,000 pounds, or forty-five times.

Corn increased from about 285,000 to about 12,000,000 bushels, or fifty times.

Oats increased from about 80,000 to 22,000,000 bushels, or two hundred and eighty times.

Barley increased from 4,000 to 338,000 bushels, or eighty-five times.

The excess in values was more than $48,000,000.

Can any farmer, can any man, Democrat or Republican, who understands the simple law of supply and demand, doubt for a single moment that these excessive importations all along our northern border prevented the farmer from receiving what he otherwise would have received for his products? Can the northwestern farmer fail to understand that an importation of over 22,000,000 bushels of oats, of 183,000,000 pounds of fresh meats, and of nearly 6,000,000 dozens of eggs during only nine months must necessarily have had a disastrous effect upon the price he was entitled to receive for those products? When his products were displaced during that time with an excess of $48,000,000 worth of other products, and most of it along this northern boundary, can he fail to understand that it must have necessarily depressed his price?

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] asked me to yield, and I declined for reasons which I then gave; and if I should now do so, I fear I should lay myself open to the imputation of favoritism.

Mr. WEST. All right, then. I simply wanted to ask what was the occasion of this wonderful increase in importations, and whether it was not due to a diminution of the crops in this country, as the result of which we needed them. Is not that why they came in here?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am sorry to say that we did not need them very badly, because they forced down the price of barley to such an extent that it would not pay the expense of raising. The price of oats went down to about thirty-odd cents a bushel. Though the price has risen a little lately on account of conditions in Canada, it is still very low.

Mr. WEST. The point I wished to raise was whether it was a diminution of our crops or whether it was an increased use of these products that accounted for this wonderful increase in percentage of importations.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; it was the taking off of the tariff. Canada is an exporting country as to all of its grain. It has to export, if it does not have drought in the Northwest, some 250,000,000 bushels of wheat. It has to export its oats. It has to send them across the ocean. If it can get into our market, which is always better than the Canadian market in the Northwest, of course it will do so. When the tariff was taken off, of course the barrier was removed and these additional cereals entered our markets.

Of course the war in Europe prevented much of the great slump in prices that was in store for the American farmer, but that was not due to the kindly purpose of the Democratic Party. War sent food prices upward. I do not censure the Democratic tariff because the cost of sugar doubled, nor do I give it credit because war raised the price of food products. The farmer could not fail to see that all of his products were on the downward scale prior to August, 1914.

TREATMENT OF NORTHERN FARMERS GROSSLY UNJUST.

Had the farmer been receiving more on his investment, or had he been receiving more for his labor than other intelligent labor of the United States, he might have no serious cause of complaint because his industry was particularly singled out for attack; but as his earnings on both his investment and labor are far less than in any other field of investment or labor, this special attack on his interest seems to me little less than criminal.

This element of sectional favoritism and prejudice manifested itself all through this tariff act. Of course, we all know that the head of the Democratic Party is in the South and the tail in the North, and that the head naturally controls the movements of the other extremity; and so when we find the Democratic Party applying its "tariff for revenue only" policy, it somehow always happens that the southern farm products come out with this incidental protection, while the northern farm products are on the free list and compelled to compete with the whole world. Thus you will find that under this Democratic tariff bill your northern rye is on the free list, but southern rice is protected about 33⅓ per cent; your northern potatoes are on the free list, but Virginia peanuts are adequately protected; your northern wool is on the free list, but Texas Angora goat wool is guarded by a fair tariff; your cream, milk, meats, eggs, and vegetables are all on the free list, but Florida lemons, pineapples, and oranges receive fair protection.

Again, this Congress passed two bills to secure Government standardization and inspection of cotton and charged the Government with all the expense, and then voted just as strongly against the bill for Government standardization and inspection of grain, although the farmers of the North were willing to pay all the expenses of such inspection.

We are getting some of the results of your failure to pass that law. Heretofore the difference in the several grades of our wheat at the regular terminal markets, between No. 1 and No. 2 northern has been from 2 to 3 cents; between No. 2 and No. 3 from 2 to 3 cents; so the greatest spread that I have ever known has never been beyond 6 or 8 cents between No. 1 and No. 3 northern. To-day, however, it is 18 cents. While our contracts are based upon No. 1, which may be $1.07 to-day, say, in Minneapolis, when you come to No. 3—and that is 90 per cent of all the wheat raised now in our State—this year you find the price 18 cents below that, and after paying freight we do not get more than about seventy-odd cents a bushel for this grain.

There is not a paragraph in the last Democratic revenue law that does not give the Northern farmer a slap in the face, and to show his fidelity to his party the Northern Democrat gives him the final kick.

TAXES ARE LEVIED ON BURDENS AND NOT ON BENEFITS.

Mr. President, when a war tax or any internal revenue tax, which is always an unequal tax, is contemplated, our first thought ordinarily is to find the men or the business which can best afford to shoulder the added burden. But here our Democratic friends, assiduously looking for objects of taxation, close their eyes to one of the greatest opportunities to secure an enormous revenue without seriously affecting incomes of the parties responding to the demand.

If one of these Democratic statesmen would just ascend the Capitol Dome on any clear day and look northeasterly he would observe a monument, nearly as high as the dome, constructed by a gentleman who had more money than he could expend for useful purposes, and capped with the corona of a bromo seltzer bottle. If he could look far enough southward, he could see the mansions and parks of the Coco Cola proprietor. If he would avail himself of the privileges of a New York sightseeing car and listen to the announcements of the guide as he drove slowly along the Hudson Boulevard, he would be astounded at the number of palaces erected and maintained by patent-medicine proprietors.

Mr. President, the patent-medicine dope has made more multimillionaires in the United States than all other businesses combined, and it has given the people less in return. There is a greater profit on this investment than in any other line of enterprise. The duped and doped people pay more to and receive less from these proprietors than in any other investment. And yet, while you are proposing a tax of from 10 to 15 per cent on every farmer who uses and every owner of a little Ford who buys a gallon of gasoline, you purposely fail to see these people who have the greatest gold mines on the face of the earth. You can levy this tax on the gallons of dope as they are produced and according to the real profit earned on each gallon, in the same manner as you levy your tax on beers and ales. It will then fall on the maker and not on the drug-store proprietor. This tax of 10 to 15 per cent on gasoline is exorbitant and grossly oppressive. This release of the patent-medicine proprietors is outrageously unjust to those who do bear the burdens.

There is one item of taxation in your additional revenue scheme which bids fair to bring in an ever-increasing revenue so long as your policies are continued, and that is the taxation on indebtedness, on every note and mortgage and every renewal thereof. The longer you hold on the more mortgages there will be given and the more taxes collected. But I submit, Mr. President, that taxes ought not to be levied on burdens already hard to bear while so many benefits continue untaxed.

TEMPORARY BORROWING RATHER THAN TAX BURDENING.

Mr. President, when your previous tariff act failed to secure sufficient revenues for governmental needs President Cleveland was courageous enough to borrow $62,000,000 to meet the deficit. He did the right thing, and no one ever criticized his action. The only criticism was directed against the law that created the deficit. Mr. Cleveland had faith that in the end the old Wilson-Gorman Act would replenish the Treasury. You ought to have the same courage

Mr. President, the adage that "honesty is the best policy" is just as applicable to political parties as to individuals. A candid acknowledgment that your tariff act is a failure is far better than any kind of evasion. A charge for interest on whatever sum we may need to borrow to meet the deficit is far better than any unjust, unequal, and extortionate war tax. If, like President Cleveland, you have any faith in your tariff act that it will, if given time, meet the present deficit, then show your faith in that measure by issuing the necessary bonds or certificates of indebtedness to cover the temporary exigency and relieve the people from this contemplated war-tax burden.

The fact that you insist upon the tax is evidence of your lack of confidence in your own works; that you fear this colossal revenue structure so carefully planned by you in 1913, propped and buttressed as it is with new instrumentalities of taxation, is cracked, shaken, and dangerous to both the builders and the country. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any manifestation of approval or disapproval by occupants of the galleries of the Senate is out of order, and the next offenders will be ejected from the galleries.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I said a short time ago that one ought to compare the reduction that was made in this tariff on our northern products with those upon your southern farm products. So I will ask also to insert a table covering the reduction upon those things that are produced for the most part south of the old Mason and Dixon line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The table referred to is as follows:

Southern products.

After 1916, according to the terms of the bill, sugar is to be free.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has just delivered an admirable address, unfortunately to practically empty seats upon the other side of the Chamber, although some very distinguished Senators are in their seats, which is quite to their credit. The Senator started out with the suggestion that the Committee on Finance is now engaged in framing a deficiency tax law. I have an impression in my mind that the honored Senator from North Dakota is a member of the Committee on Finance. He has illustrated by his argument a familiarity with the intricate fiscal policies of the Government in a manner very creditable to him and distinctly creditable to the Senate and to the country. His long service in the Senate entitles him to high rank among his fellows and to a position of great responsibility in framing laws. Is it possible that the Committee on Finance are now engaged in framing a law which proposes to burden the American people to the extent of $100,000,000 and are not to avail themselves of the experience and the distinguished services of the Senator from North Dakota? I can not believe that that great committee are proceeding in a strictly partisan manner behind closed doors in a work of such national importance. Have not the Republican members of that committee been invited to participate in the work now going on? Is this tax to be levied upon Democrats alone?

Why, Mr. President, has not the distinguished and able Senator from North Dakota been invited to participate in a work of such importance as the work which is now being done by the Committee on Finance? Is it possible that in the stress and storm of our financial and industrial dilemma men of eminence and students of fiscal affairs, clothed with the responsibilities of their States, are not to be invited or even permitted to sit at the same table and discuss the questions of importance that necessarily arise with their fellow committeemen?

Mr. President, this is not creditable to the parliamentary processes of the Senate. Partisans have no right to proceed in framing laws of importance and great consequence to all the people of our country behind closed doors and possibly in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Was the Senator from Michigan a member of this body when the Payne-Aldrich bill was enacted, may I ask?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was a member of this body at that time and participated in making that great protective law, for which I have never been called upon to offer an apology. It was intensely American from the first line to the last, and no deficiency ever arose under it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is the Senator not aware that that tariff law was first framed and formulated by the Republican members of the Finance Committee, and that the Democratic members of the Finance Committee were excluded from its deliberations?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, my honored friend from New York has gone quite far afield from the present situation to find a precedent for such conduct. The truth is that the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was a piece of general legislation. It was not the creature of depression and did not arise out of any industrial contingency which made it necessary to impose extraordinary taxes on the people.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But did it not impose a burden upon the masses of the people?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; it did not add a single feather's weight to the people's burden. It removed the burden, if any existed, in hundreds of cases.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I only want to call attention to the fact that there is nothing exceptional in the conduct of the Democratic members of the Finance Committee in having a preliminary conference as to the character of legislation that will be offered to the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am obliged to my honored friend from New York, whose judgment I greatly respect, but the Payne-Aldrich bill was the result of extended hearings. It was a revision of a previous law enacted by the same political party under the leadership of William McKinley and Thomas B. Reed and Nelson Dingley, and I voted for that law, and was a member of the party which was responsible for the then existing tariff law; and even then it was not enacted until the public was invited to come and view its inmost secrets; every hearing before that committee was public. I ask my honored friend from New York what citizen of our country has been invited to a hearing before the Committee on Finance now framing a bill to impose taxation to the extent of $100,000,000 upon the American people, and I pause for a reply. The deathlike silence of this Chamber gives eloquent emphasis to the statement which I made a moment ago that the Democratic Members of the Finance Committee are meeting behind closed doors, even shutting out the public from their deliberations——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I only rose to say that to exclude a valuable member of that committee like my honorable friend from North Dakota is to deprive the committee of the advice and counsel of an experienced legislator, who has proven his right to a place at the committee table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have just one question to address to my friend from Michigan. Can he inform the Senate whether the public was invited by the Republican Senate Committee on Finance to public hearings when it was considering the Spanish War tax 16 years ago?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from New York can not point to a time in the history of the Republican Party when it has been necessary to resort to an inquisitorial method of raising revenue, except when our own country was engaged in war, and even then the public was fully heard and approved the McKinley plan for raising money to meet the extraordinary expenses of the Spanish War. But, sir, this is exceptional; the Government proposes in time of national peace to lay its heavy hand upon certain business interests of the country and extract therefrom enough to make up the deficiency in revenue which the profligacy of the present administration has brought upon the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly. In fact, I yield the floor because I only rose to point to an error of judgment on the part of my Democratic associates in refusing to counsel with or take the advice of experienced men in framing a law which will be national in its character and far-reaching in its effect.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the administration ought at least to give some reason why this war-revenue measure should be passed other than claim that it is on account of the lack of revenues from customs receipts.

I have been unable to find a good reason why this revenue bill should be brought before Congress at this time. I have not the time now to state why I think it is done, but I will do so before the passage of the revenue bill. However, at this particular time——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SMOOT. In just one moment. At this particular time I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that I hold in my hand a daily statement of the United States Treasury for September 25, 1914—remember, Senators, this covers nearly one-quarter of the coming fiscal year—and let me compare the revenues for this fiscal year with the fiscal year of 1913, from July 1 to September 25 of each year. The revenues for this fiscal year during that time are more than they were for the fiscal year 1913. The revenues the Government had received on the 25th day of September, 1914, in this fiscal year were $170,444,293.13. Up to the same day of the year 1913 the revenues collected by the Government were only $169,665,869.01.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That includes the income tax?

Mr. SMOOT. That, of course, includes all the revenue of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed to jam through Congress a revenue measure to raise $100,000,000, and I do not believe the people of this country will approve it. The only reason, Mr. President, why it is to be passed is to cover up the extravagance of the appropriations that have been made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I have not the honor of being a member of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, but in view of the statement made by the Senator from Michigan I ought to take the liberty of saying that many weeks ago I read in the daily papers a statement to the effect that the Republican Members of the Senate had met in a caucus or conference and had determined to oppose any bill raising the revenue in any form. I should like to ask either the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Utah if that statement is correct; and if so, what use would there be in having the Republican Members present if they had already prejudged the case?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, unfortunately the Republican Members of the Senate have little to do and no place to go except the cloakroom or conference chamber. We can not participate in any of the preliminary proceedings of the legislation, because the doors are locked against us. We are summoned by the Sergeant at Arms and our presence demanded at all hours of the night to make a quorum, but the moment we get here all we are expected to do is to answer "present" and sit down and be quiet and inoffensive and not delay the proceedings of this body.

The Senator from Texas asks whether we have met in caucus. I answer that we have not met in caucus. We have had informal meetings of our Republican membership. A half dozen or a dozen of us gathered for a brief interchange of views; one by one the Members went about their various departmental duties, and the conference resulted in nothing more than a mere friendly interchange of mutual felicitations. So far as mapping out any definite program of resistance to your plans to be followed on this side of the Chamber regarding any legislation, there was nothing of that kind done. The initiation and consummation of legislation in this body has been appropriated by our opponents upon the other side of the Chamber, regardless of our wishes or desires or suggestions, and that program is to be completed, I understand, regardless of consequences.

I said a moment ago that the initiation of these measures arose on the other side of the Chamber. I am in error. These measures originate outside the Chamber, well up the Avenue, and come down here, usually handmade and ready for ratification, merely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to say to him that the Republicans do not have caucuses? They have conferences; and the only agreement that I ever knew anything about in the 15 years I have been here in their conferences was an agreement that they did not purpose to enact legislation by caucus. That they left for the other side of the Chamber to do. We do advise, but no Member is bound to anything, nor is there ever any attempt to bind any Member in any conference I have ever attended. Government by caucus is an innovation adopted only since the present administration came into power.

Mr. CULBERSON. My inquiry related not only to a caucus, but to a conference, the Senator will remember.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will simply say to the Senator that I have attended no conference, and I think I have attended them all, in which anyone has agreed to do anything or to refrain from doing anything.

Mr. CULBERSON. The press reported that the Republican Members had held something like a caucus or conference and had determined to oppose any additional taxation at this time, prejudging the question, and consequently, I presume, though I speak not by authority, the Democratic members of the Committee on Finance decided that as the question had been predetermined by the Republican Members there was no necessity for inviting them into the meeting of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Probably it would have been as well to have given us the invitation and then see whether we desired to refuse it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I fear the Senator from Texas has never been a member of the Finance Committee, because if he had been——

Mr. CULBERSON. I said that at the outset, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. If he had been, he would have known that the invitation would not have been extended, even though the papers had not reported such a meeting.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say that all that was done at the conference to which the Senator has referred was the suggestion by some of the Republicans present as to what amendments, if any, should be offered to the proposed revenue bill. I myself will admit that I discussed the question as to the advisability of offering an amendment repealing the clause in the present tariff law placing sugar upon the free list. Nothing, however, was decided upon at the conference; no vote, even, was taken upon it, and the matter was left entirely to the individual judgment of every Member upon this side of the Chamber.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Utah whether he knows of any Republican Member of the Senate who favors the passage of an emergency revenue bill at this session?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not; because I do not think there is a Republican Senator who thinks that there is any necessity for such a measure. I certainly do not think that there is any necessity for it; I think that it is uncalled for and unjustifiable; and I do not believe that a burden of a hundred million dollars ought to be laid upon the business interests of this country to-day, when they are struggling to maintain themselves and to preserve their business existence. Therefore, Mr. President, I say that it is unwise. I am only speaking for myself and so far as my own judgment goes. Of course I recognize the fact that the Democrats will be responsible for the passage of the proposed revenue bill; I recognize the fact that it will be charged up to them; but I do not think that there is a Democrat who should even suggest the idea that no Republican has a right to call attention to the conditions of the country and to state his reasons for believing that a measure of that kind should not be passed at this time.

That is about all that I care to say at this time, except, Mr. President, to say that I want the Senate to understand, while I am opposed to the passage of the proposed revenue bill, I shall in no manner try to filibuster against its passage. I will be content to say why I am opposed to it, and to give my reasons to the country for my position, and then let the good people of the country judge as to who is right in this matter.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 6440) to authorize the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Co. and the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Paul, Minn.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the California State Association of Motion Picture Owners, of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on motion picture houses, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of W. C. Ralston, of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on the par value of certificates of mining corporations, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Paul Rieger & Co., of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed tax on perfumery and toilet articles, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Grass Valley, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to suspend the mining laws relative to assessment work for 1914, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented petitions of the Chamber of Commerce of Oakland; the Fraternal Brotherhood, Maple Leaf Lodge, No. 360, of Oakland, and of sundry citizens, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to civil-service employees, which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. KERN presented a memorial of the Atkins Saw Works and 100 other leading business firms of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the adoption of the clause in the report of the conference committee on the Clayton trust bill respecting interlocking directors in banks and trust companies, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FLETCHER presented memorials of the Habana State Bank, the Clearing House Association of Gainesville, the First National Bank of St. Augustine, and of the Clearing House Association of Jacksonville, all in the State of Florida, remonstrating against the proposed tax of $2 per thousand on capital and surplus of banks, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Board of Trade of Palatka, Fla., remonstrating against the proposed tax on gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OLIVER:

A bill (S. 6561) granting an increase of pension to Salome Nothhardt (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6562) granting an increase of pension to Jennie Jones (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 6563) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Spurlock (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 6564) granting a pension to Grace L. Messler; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 6505) for the temporary relief of cotton growers in the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

EMERGENCY REVENUE LEGISLATION.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLIVER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 18891) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ALASKA COAL LANDS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] having left the city for an indefinite period of time, I ask unanimous consent that he be relieved from further service as a conferee on the part of the Senate on House bill 14233, the Alaska coal-land bill, and that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] be appointed in his place.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, is that in regard to the Alaska coal-land bill?

Mr. MYERS. It is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Who are the other conferees?

Mr. MYERS. On the part of the Senate, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and myself, and on the part of the House, Mr. FERRIS, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, and Mr. LENROOT.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My recollection is that the Senator from Arizona was quite hostile to the bill, although I believe he finally voted for it. I believe it is ordinarily the custom to appoint conferees who are friendly to the bill. I have no doubt, however, that the Senator from Arizona, if appointed a conferee, will, notwithstanding his personal views, undertake to carry out the wishes of the Senate, as indicated by the Senate amendments to the bill.

I asked the question only to ascertain whether or not the Senator from Montana had considered that feature of the matter. I do not intend to interpose an objection to the appointment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of my colleague whether the Senator from Arizona is desirous of serving as one of the conferees?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know that he is. I will say why I made the request.

The Senator from Nevada sat for two days in the conference. It was my idea and his idea also, when he was appointed a conferee, that the conference would be finished in two days' time. He had made his arrangements to leave on the night of the second day, and we thought the conference would be finished by that time, but it proceeded much more slowly than was anticipated.

A great many differences arose and were discussed at great length, and a good part of the work was settled before the Senator from Nevada left. There are certain things yet to be settled, however; and the way the conferees stand now, there appears to be a great deal of difficulty in getting them together. I do not want to see a disagreement, and there appears to be very much difficulty. We are making slow progress. I suggested to the conferees at our meeting to-day that perhaps the appointment of a conferee to take the place of the Senator from Nevada, thus making a full membership, might facilitate matters and enable us to dispose of the questions in dispute; and they agreed that it was desirable that we should have a full membership on the conference.

I suggested the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] because he is the second ranking member of the committee. I do not know that he is desirous of serving. I asked him to-day whether he would serve if appointed, and he said he would. So far as I am concerned, I do not care to pass over any member of the Committee on Public Lands and place somebody else ahead of them. I have no preference or choice in the matter. I simply suggested the Senator from Arizona because he comes second on the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would the Senator from Montana object to the appointment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] as a conferee? He is in entire sympathy with the measure.

Mr. MYERS. Having spoken to the Senator from Arizona, and he being the second member on the committee, I consider that it would be a very great discourtesy to him to go to work and select another conferee without consulting him. Having spoken to him, and he having agreed to serve, I simply ask that he may be appointed; that is all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is very far from me to desire to have the Senate do anything that would be discourteous to the Senator from Arizona. I have only made these suggestions for the consideration of the Senator who is now making this request. Of course if the Senator from Arizona desires to serve as a conferee I have no objection. I have no objection anyhow. I have made the suggestions which I have made, and have no doubt that the Senator from Arizona, notwithstanding his personal objection to the policy which is adopted by the Senate in the passage of this bill—a leasing of coal lands rather than their patenting—would in good faith undertake to carry out the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the Senator from Arizona has the least bit of desire in the matter one way or the other—neither a desire to serve nor a desire not to serve. He simply said that he would serve if asked to do so. Most of the points of difference have been settled. There are only a few remaining. It is possible that at our next meeting, which will be on Monday morning next, we may finish with a partial set of conferees; but it seemed to be the general opinion that it would be much better to have a full membership on the conference, so I simply make the request and submit it to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it is so ordered, and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is appointed a conferee in place of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

THE COTTON INDUSTRY.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a letter bearing on the cotton situation, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 2, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Secretary of the Treasury can announce that within one week he will deposit in the national banks throughout the South several hundred million dollars and very largely dispel the gloom overhanging the Southern States on account of the prostrated and paralyzed cotton market. You have this indisputable right under section 5153, Revised Statutes, which gives you plenary powers.

In March, 1913, a terrible storm flood swept over the Ohio Valley. In your annual report of 1913, in the very front page, with apparent exultant pride, you recite: "The banks of that city were afraid to reopen their doors because of the temporary impairment of confidence." You further add: "The citizens' relief committee asked that a representative of the department be sent right away to see about financing our banking institutions. * * * A national bank examiner was immediately dispatched to Dayton, and within 24 hours after his arrival the department designated every national bank in Dayton as a Government depositary, and announced that it would deposit in said national banks $2,000,000 of Government funds, to be secured by State, municipal, or other local bonds acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury. The effect of this action was to restore confidence at once. The banks reopened their doors, and instead of the anticipated need of $2,000,000 the Treasury was called on for only $182,000. If you will use this example of depositing millions in a small locality like Dayton and spread out public funds in the same proportion over the entire South, you can promptly save our people from the impending disaster now upon them. A simple announcement of your intention would preserve your native land from bankruptcy. You have unquestioned authority to say to every national bank in the South: "Take cotton as security at 8 cents per pound, require the farmer's note running for six months, bearing 3 per cent interest. Do this as the fiscal agent of the Government under section 5153, Revised Statutes. The Government will at once place in your hands the public funds to finance those transactions." Thus, as you saved Dayton, Ohio, last year you can rescue 30,000,000 of people in the South.

You can deposit the money, make terms with every national bank in the South as trustee, persuade them as fiscal agents to gather in warehouse receipts on cotton and utilize those receipts as security for the loan of Government funds at a very low rate of interest, as you did when you scattered the crop funds throughout the States in 1913. You justly glory in that on page 2 of your report, and are proud that you stretched the precedents. You say: "The Secretary announced that as security for such deposits 'high-class commercial paper' would be accepted at 65 per cent of its face value," etc. You add: "This was an unprecedented step, because commercial paper had never before been accepted as security for Government deposits." And: "The moment it became known that the Government stood ready to assist, the tension was relieved, business resumed a normal aspect, and the fall movement of crops, trade, and commerce proceeded upon an easier and safer basis than for many years past."

As Secretary of the Treasury, shift the Government deposits, now about $74,000,000, to the South, sell two hundred millions of Panama Canal bonds to those getting up gold pools for Europe and on New York City loans, and utilize our cotton as security for the Government loans, as you did "commercial paper" last year, and in one short week you can rescue the South from ruin and a wild orgy of bankruptcies soon to ensue.

If you need a little more legal authority to do this, you can win the President in an instant to help you, and the message of both the President and yourself to Congress can strengthen and free your hands in an hour to do just as you please to find a way to save a billion-dollar cotton crop. Aye, if you wish it and will say the word, we can instantly add to those Government deposits and the proceeds from the Panama Canal bonds combined $200,000,000 more by the issuance of United States notes.

It is with you. Congress can provide the additional funds when you and the President say go forward, and we can authorize you in a few brief words to use our cotton this year as security instead of bonds and commercial paper, as you did last year, and the glorious deed is done. Will our Secretary of the Treasury rise to the occasion? You can.

Please let me have your attitude on these points at the earliest practicable moment, as it will determine my official conduct as a Representative in Congress.

With cordial regards, I am,

Sincerely, yours, R. L. HENRY.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 2, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Incline Thine ear, O God our Father, and hear our petition. Bear with our infirmities; forgive our sins; quicken our conscience; illumine our minds, and prepare us by the discipline of daily life to meet whatsoever transitions may come to us with Christian fortitude, with firm resolve to do the right as it is given us to see the right, leaving the results to Thee, who knoweth the beginning and the end. And Thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF ERRORS IN PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the further consideration of House joint resolution 361 and take up the same for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Invalid Pensions from the further consideration of House joint resolution 361, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 361) to correct certain errors in H. R. 12045, H. R. 12914, H. R. 13542, H. R. 14234, H. R. 14738, H. R. 15692, and H. R. 16294.

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 12045 (private act, No. 50), approved July 1, 1914, Mary Quinlan, widow of John T. Quinlan, late of Company B, One hundred and fifty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read "Mary Quinlan, widow of Thomas T. Quinlan"; and

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 12914 (private act, No. 86), approved July 21, 1914, Sarah C. Kennedy, former widow of Lewis H. Hurt, late of Company K, Seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, the name of the soldier was changed to read "Lewis C. Hunt"; and

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 13542 (private act, No. 88), approved July 21, 1914, the designation of the military service of one William H. Conklin, late of Company B, One hundred and twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read "Company C, One hundred and twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry"; and

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 14234 (private act, No. 90), approved July 21, 1914, the name of David S. Trent, late of Company B, Fifty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, was changed to read "Davis S. Trent"; and

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 14738 (private act, No. 92), approved July 21, 1914, Amy Day, widow of Lorenzo Day, the name of the soldier was changed to read "Leronza Day"; and

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 15692 (private act, No. 95), approved July 21, 1914, Jennie L. Maginn, widow of Loughlin F. Maginn, late of Company H, Sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, the soldier's name was changed to read "Loughlier F. Maginn"; and

Whereas an error was made in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions upon H. R. 16294 (private act, No. 100), approved July 30, 1914, Malinda Logsdon, widow of Mathew Logsdon, late of Company E, Eleventh Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, the name of the soldier was changed to read "Matthew Logsdon," and the designation of his service to read "Company E, Tenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry"; that in the same report and private number, the designation of the military service of one William McCracken, late of Company B, Third Regiment New York Provisional Cavalry, was changed to read "Company H, Third Regiment New York Provisional Cavalry," and that in the same report and private number, Mary E. Greiner, former widow of Ira E. Gager, the soldier's name was changed to read "Ira E. Yager": Therefore be it,

Resolved, etc., That the said acts be corrected and amended as follows:

That the item in the act (Private, No. 50, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to one Mary Quinlan be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Mary Quinlan, widow of John T. Quinlan, late of Company B, One hundred and fifty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 86, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting a pension to one Sarah C. Kennedy be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Sarah C. Kennedy, former widow of Lewis H. Hurt, late of Company K, Seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 88, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to one William H. Conklin be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of William H. Conklin, late of Company B, One hundred and twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 90, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to one Davis S. Trent be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of David S. Trent, late of Company B, Fifty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 92, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to Amy Day be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Amy Day, widow of Lorenzo Day, late of Company F, One hundred and twenty-fifth Regiment United States Colored Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 95, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to Jennie L. Maginn be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Jennie L. Maginn, widow of Loughlin F. Maginn, late of Company H, Sixteenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 100, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to Malinda Logsdon be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Malinda Logsdon, widow of Mathew Logsdon, late of Company E, Eleventh Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 100, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting an increase of pension to William McCracken be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of William McCracken, late of Company B, Third Regiment New York Provisional Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving."

That the item in the act (Private, No. 100, 63d Cong., 2d sess.) granting a pension to one Mary E. Greiner be corrected and amended so as to read as follows:

"The name of Mary E. Greiner, former widow of Ira E. Gager, late of Company H, One hundred and ninth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few remarks concerning these corrections. I want to say that all these errors that have been corrected are absolutely immaterial except two, which were made at the Government Printing Office. I want to call your attention to the hypercritical character of these corrections. For instance, in the pension bill for Amy Day, the widow of Lorenzo Day, the name of the soldier was changed in the Printing Office to "Leronza" Day. Another criticism for which a bill has been sent back is the name of Mathew Logsdon, where Mathew was spelled with two "t's" instead of one. I think it is due to this House to know the character of these criticisms, and I think the question ought to be settled now whether a bureau of the Government on an immaterial error can nullify a law of Congress.

I want to say further that the Committee on Invalid Pensions has been short, during the time your speaker has been chairman of that committee, of one session clerk, and that during the last Congress there were introduced 15,281 pension bills in this House, and that one examiner detailed by the Pension Office was compelled to examine all those bills, and because of that work, which was something stupendous, he lost his life. He undertook to attend the reunion at Gettysburg of the Blue and Gray, and he died there in consequence of overwork. Then we detailed another pension examiner, and we have had at this session of Congress 9,647 private pension bills introduced by Members of this House, all of which had to be examined—a most stupendous work; and not a single mistake has been made on the merits of a single bill. All of the criticisms have been immaterial and unnecessary. Of the number of bills introduced the House has passed up to this time 1,670 private pension bills.

That is all I care to say now, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following joint resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. McANDREWS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] may proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] be allowed to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, of course I do not want to object to the gentleman having an opportunity to talk, but I think it is very important, if we want to get an early adjournment—which I think now begins to look as if it were in sight [applause]—that we should get this bill now pending before the House out of the way before Monday, because I do not know but if this rule supersedes Monday, and we can not use it for an opportunity to suspend the rules on two bills, it might delay matters, and I think we could possibly push the matter through. On Tuesday or Wednesday, while we are waiting for business from the Senate, the gentleman may have full opportunity to talk.

Mr. MANN. Probably this bill will not be out of the way Monday, anyhow; and if that is the case, I think the Committee on Rules ought to report a rule Monday displacing this bill for Monday, and possibly doing the same thing when the conference report on the Clayton antitrust bill is ready to come before the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If there is no objection, I think it would expedite business. But, pending that, I would ask unanimous consent that the rule in reference to this bill shall not displace the business in order next Monday, and that it shall not interfere with the consideration of the conference report on the trust bill when it comes back from the Senate.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to the first part of that request, I will say that there are some of us here who can not consent to that at this time. We might be able to do so a little bit later, but I shall have to object at this time; and there are other gentlemen here who would object, too.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall have to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the House resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the regular order is, under the ruling of the Chair, to submit my request to the House.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is so; but unless the gentleman is very urgent to-day, I hope he will withdraw his request for the present.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw it for the present and submit it later in the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to the gentleman's addressing the House, but I am very anxious to push this bill forward, and I think the House is of that mind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] withdraws the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Laughter.]

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18459, the Philippine bill, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] in the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 18459) to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands, with Mr. FLOOD of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire how much time remains for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has 39 minutes, the gentleman from Iowa 37 minutes, and then each has 15 minutes after the reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I request the gentleman from Iowa to use some of his time now.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the bill as we are now discussing it does not in words specifically declare for the immediate independence of the Philippines, but it does state that independence is to be assured as soon as a stable government is established therein.

I have raised the question whether under that wording the Philippines could not have independence without any further action of Congress, by a simple recognition of it by the President. If independence is not to be granted——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This declaration must be read in its entirety. It says:

Whereas it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein; and—

Now, independence can not be declared by any official, unless there is specific authority given somewhere for that official to exercise.

Mr. FESS. I will say to the gentleman that what he quotes there is not a pronouncement of Congress, but simply a statement which is not a part of the law at all. It is in the preamble, and if the preamble is not to be a part of the law, then it ought not to be here, and if it is to be a part of the law, then the statement, I think, is quite serious.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the preamble, even if adopted, is not a legislative enactment. It is merely an expression of the purpose or explanation. If this declaration be adopted there would still be legislative authority required to be conferred upon some official to withdraw the sovereignty of the United States from the Philippine Islands. Where is that authority?

Mr. FESS. Whether a nation is independent or not is not so much a matter for this Congress, but is a matter for the President, who receives the recognized representative from that nation. Therefore it is not so much a legislative function as it is an executive function. That is the question I am raising here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield to the gentleman any further.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is an interesting discussion. The gentleman knows that what he says might be true of a nation with which we have absolutely no connection, but we own the Philippine Islands, and the President could not make them independent by recognizing some one accredited to this Government from the Philippines.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I must insist that I can not have all my time taken by these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would improve the gentleman's speech.

Mr. FESS. I am inclined to think it does improve the gentleman's speech, but I do not want to have all my time taken. If what the gentleman from New York says is true, that there is no such meaning of independence in this bill, then this bill is not in pursuance of the pledge that has been made at least four times by the party in power, which is responsible for this legislation. One place you go to interpret the bill as to the policy which it means to declare is to the preceding pronouncement of the party now in power pledged to fulfill its promises. Secondly, if I were in doubt, I would study the speeches made on the bill pro and con as we hear them on the floor of the House.
